The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, hereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THE program for the Universal Week of Prayer, Sunday, January 1, to Saturday, January 7, has just been completed. Subjects of prayer are arranged as follows:

Jan. 2. Thanksgiving for all serving Christ in all lands; for opening of the world to the Gospel; for the desire for union among the churches; for signs of spiritual awakening and revival. Also for general confession of sin and unworthiness. Jan. 3. Prayer that to the Church there may be given a clear message to the age and clearer light on the path of church union. Jan. 4. Penitence for all arrogance, covetousness, injustice, or falsehood, in international affairs; for all failure of Christian nations to realize the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man; prayer for the coming of the Kingdom and reign of Christ; that the hearts of nations that have been at war may be cleansed from the passion of revenge; that stricken lands may again be blessed with plenty; that in the economic reconstruction of Society, the law of Christ may be fulfilled. Prayer for all employers and employees, and all labor movements and democracies of our day, that they may own Christ as Lord; and that the Press of the world may be used to establish truth and justice. Jan. 5. Prayer for missions, and for missionaries; for all experiencing difficulty or persecution; for the Moslem world, and for the heathen still in darkness. Jan. 6. Prayer for families, educational establishments, and the young. Jan. 7. Prayer for Home Missions, and the Jews.

It has been an unusually busy week with the Prayer League and many letters have been received.

E. K., Los Angeles, Cal., writes: "I am in very deep trouble—a trouble which I can not put on paper—I can not seem to reach God. Won't you please pray that God will deliver me from this trouble?"

Mrs. W. R., North Carolina, a widow with six children, asks for prayer "that God may provide for my six children—may open a way for me—and that I may not give up in despair when things look dark, as they often do."

Old Subscriber, Wooster, Ohio, writes: "Please pray for the release of my husband who has been sentenced to prison for the crime of another. He is a good Christian man, an ex-soldier. Also that I may be healed of a dread disease."

E. R. H., Iowa, writes: "I ask an interest in your prayers for my children. They are all young men and women, but have no thought of the hereafter. Pray that they may be saved and learn to know what they must do to make Heaven their home."

Mrs. W. B. N., North Dak., writes: "I have not heard from my oldest son since March, 1920. Please pray that, if he be living, I may hear good news from him; and if dead, that he died a Christian."

J. H. B., Mo., writes: "I wish to be enrolled as a member and also ask prayers on behalf of a brother who, having failed in business and losing everything he had—including his home which he had to give up to pay his debts—has lost his grip on religion and given up trying to do anything. He is in a state of melancholy which is affecting him mentally and physically."

Mrs. G. W. J., Kan., writes: "I am writing you to thank you for your prayers and to acknowledge God's answer to them. He took me safely through a sickness, and spared our baby to us after all gave up hopes of his recovery. I know it was through prayer that our lives were spared. My dear mother wrote me that she was able to walk some after your prayers in her behalf. Won't you please continue to pray that she will keep on gaining in health, and be saved from another stroke of paralysis?"

S. S., Ont., writes: "While on an emergency case in Montreal about three months ago, I sent a request for prayers to prevent the foreclosure of a mortgage, and received without a doubt a direct answer from God! I thank God and the Prayer League."

Among general requests are the following: For health, 75; financial aid, 14; reunion, 3; conversion, 52; rain, 1; Holy Spirit, 4; peace, 7; employment, 5; faith, 4; prohibition, 1; spiritual advancement, 3; forgiveness, 5; guidance, 5; and wisdom, 3.

Bertha M. H. writes: "During the past spring my parents have died and I am now left an orphan. Please pray for me."

"We are trying to have law enforcement," writes E. B., Herkimer, N. Y. "Pray for us that our Union may be able to close the saloons in our town."

With these extra-flavory oats

Serve the oat dish at its best.

This is the supreme food—almost the ideal food. As a body-builder, as a vim-food it holds a premier place.

Give it that fragrance and flavor which Nature confers on fine oats.

Make it with Quaker Oats always.

This brand is flaked from queen grains only—just the rich, plump, flavory oats.

All the small grains are discarded—the puny, unripe and insipid.

Thus millions of oat lovers, all the world over, have been won to this luscious flavor.

Countless people send overseas to get it.

You have only to specify Quaker Oats to get it at any store.

For the family's sake don't forget.

Paul in Corinth

International Sunday-School Lesson for October 2
Acts 18:1-23

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

IT WAS Elijah who said "It is enough—take away my life." Not so with Paul, who had had hard experiences in Athens. In fact, he had been all but fleeing from place to place from the time when he accepted the Macedonian call and left Troas. It would be interesting to know the mental attitude of this preacher as he sat, wearied at the wayside and just in sight of Corinth. The distance from Athens is about fifty miles. He had so little ready money that he must needs resort to his trade of tent-making that he might not be a burden to others or come to actual want. Later he wrote to the Corinthian Christians and told them just how he did feel as he made his entry into their city. He said (I Corinthians 2:3), "And I was with you in weakness, and in fear and in much trembling." He also declared his supreme purpose in coming to them in the second verse of that chapter: "For I determined not to know anything among you, save Jesus Christ and Him crucified."

Corinth represented the extreme of gayety and licentiousness. On the next missionary journey Paul wrote the letter to the Romans, probably from Corinth. He certainly pictured conditions in Corinth when he wrote as he did in Romans 1:18-32. The worship of Venus was at its height of baseness in this city, which was situated at the cross-roads of travel between the East and the West and which joined northern and southern Achaia. The Isthmian games were held there every two years and that fact added to the general wickedness, for then men and women sought to excel themselves in their extent of wrongdoing.

How are the mighty fallen! Today at the site of ancient Corinth there is a village of fewer than 200 people, while modern Corinth is three miles away. The general location of Corinth must always be an important center, though the present population is only about 5,000. For further information concerning Corinth, refer to your encyclopedia, Bible dictionary, books mentioned in other articles, and to the public library.

TWO eventful years were spent here. The beginning was humble, yet Paul went on from strength to strength and apparently left at his own time and not by necessity. The first comforting companionship seems to begin with a fellow tent-maker, Aquila. He may have met this man at the synagogue, since men of like occupation grouped themselves together at their place of worship. At the start Timothy and Silas were not with Paul. When these two evangelizers arrived, Paul was greatly comforted and encouraged. They brought financial help from the Philippians, and Paul could work less with his hands and have much more time for preaching. (Phil. 4:15; II Cor. 11:8-9.)

About the time of the arrival of the helpers from Macedonia, Paul reached his conclusion to turn away from the synagogue, where some were so opposed to the messages that they even blasphemed. Right near to this place of public worship was the home of Titus Justus, and here the Gentile audience, together with certain believing Jews, assembled. For a year and a half Paul was in the midst of a blessed work of grace. Crispus, the ruler of the synagogue, was among the number of those who believed and were baptized. As in other cities the unbelieving Jews tried to stir up persecution and Paul was again brought before the judgment-seat. This time the ruler, Gallio the pro-consul of Achaia, was fair to Paul, though unfair to Sosthenes. One of the results of modern civilization is equal justice for all.

Letter-writing for eternal influences began by Paul at Corinth. In connection with the review study of last week, the letters of Paul were named, the places where written and the location in Acts where memoranda should be made concerning the writing of individual epistles. From Corinth Paul wrote and sent both epistles to the Thessalonians on this second journey. Romans and Galatians were probably written from Corinth on the third journey and two letters were sent to the Corinthians while on the third journey. Thus six epistles are connected with Corinth. Rome also has six—Philippians, Colossians, Philemon, Ephesians, II Timothy—written from Rome—and the letter to the Romans (from Corinth). The churches that Paul founded have passed away with the lapse of time. The epistles which he wrote have been continuous blessings to millions of believers for nearly 1900 years: they form the basis for the doctrinal and creedal statements of all the churches. You can not know Paul without studying his letters to the churches. Read each one of them frequently. Paul made his letters worth-while and of permanent value. Our letter-writing can also be more purposeful. Many have been won to Jesus Christ through the letter from a friend.

Paul gives us his estimate of relative values in II Corinthians 10:10, when he writes, "For, his letters, they say, are weighty and strong; but his bodily presence is weak, and his speech of no account."

MESSAGES of tremendous import came to Paul by Divine inspiration on several occasions that are recorded, and doubtless at many other times of which no mention was made in the published writings. At times these night messages were at the beginning of a new chapter in his life, that he might be fortified before the hard experiences came to him. Paul was not afraid of a heavenly vision. He had learned how to listen to the voice of the Most High. Make special study of the following: Acts 9:3, 10 (Damascus); Acts 22:17 (Jerusalem); Acts 16:9 (Troas); Acts 18:9 (Corinth and today's lesson); Acts 23:11 (Jerusalem); Acts 27:23 (Mediterranean). You can find other places of direct communion and encouragement, such as at Philippi (Acts 16:26). After Paul had heard God say to him in Corinth, verse 9, "Be not afraid, but speak and hold not thy peace," he was indeed assured that he did just right in changing from the synagogue to the home of Titus Justus.

The canon of Scripture may be closed, put the direct, personal revelations from our Heavenly Father have not ceased. One reason we do not hear more is because we do not practise the habit of the presence of God. We must be still if we would distinguish the voice of our God.

We do not necessarily need to go away to any "retreat" to be alone with God. Christ told us how, long ages past: "Enter into thine inner chamber, and having shut the door, pray to thy Father." (Matthew 6:6.)

When Paul felt that his work, for the present, was concluded in Corinth, he took Aquila and Priscilla and went to Ephesus. There he left these worthy examples of Jesus Christ after he had spent some time in personal work with the Jews in that synagogue. Then he went on to Caesarea and saluted the church at Jerusalem. Soon he went to Antioch and the seed-sowing of the eventual second missionary journey was completed.

To suffer hardship as a good soldier of Jesus Christ was becoming a habit with Paul, and he could exhort Timothy later with all good conscience. Thus far we have followed Paul through two missionary journeys. Have we even made one special trip for Christ in our life—a work of soul-winning? Think of those who have been in heaven for ages and will be there forever, just because Paul went forth!

At more than 10,000,000 windows and doors Chamberlin Metal Weather Strips permanently end fuel waste. They seal out cold air.

They save 25% to 50% of fuel cost.

The inrush of cold air at unprotected windows is at the rate of 22 cubic feet per minute. That means you must heat your home or business building 36 times every 12 hours. (Figures are national averages on 500,000 buildings.)

Winter after winter your fuel wastefully fights all outdoors. Winter after winter Chamberlin Metal Weather Strips save this needless cost.

Also Dust-Proof

Fuel saving is not the only advantage. Buildings are heated evenly. No cold spots around windows and doors. Curtains and decorations are not soiled by soot. Floors and furnishings are kept free of dust. Street noises are excluded. Ends rattling doors and windows.

Chamberlin Metal Weather Strip is used on 85% of all weather-stripped buildings, including public schools, colleges, banks, apartments, office buildings, stores, hotels, private residences, etc.

You want their protection and saving, too.

The World News of the Week

To assist the American delegates there will be an advisory council of twelve which is to be composed of persons chosen for their expert qualifications in military, naval, aeronautical, economic, political and international affairs. The names of these advisory delegates, who will not sit in the main conference, have not been announced as yet, but it was anticipated that there would be representatives of American womanhood and of organized labor among them.

Some of the foreign delegations are to be accompanied by a large number of advisors and helpers, that of Japan, for instance, to run well up toward the 200-mark. It is believed in diplomatic circles that the conference will last several weeks at the least, and that it may easily extend into the Spring.

Scores Die in Two Disasters

THE overflow of three streams after a terrific storm caused a flood in San Antonio, Texas, which involved a known death list of forty-seven and a property loss estimated at $3,000,000. Many persons were missing and it was feared the loss of life might mount still higher. Outside of San Antonio a large area was flooded, and a dozen lives were added to the total loss.

Relief work was conducted with dispatch and efficiency, and O. B. Black, San Antonio's mayor, announced that the city did not need outside assistance and that conditions would be back to normal in a short time.

On the same day that San Antonio was suffering from flood, twenty-four persons perished at Chester, Pa., when the footpath of a bridge collapsed under the weight of a crowd which had assembled to watch the recovery of the body of a boy who had been drowned in the Chester river. Scores were plunged into deep water in a struggling mass in which even strong swimmers were helpless, and it was with difficulty that perhaps fifty were rescued.

TROOPS LEAVING WEST VIRGINIA. Following the dispersion of the armed bands which had been threatening an invasion of the Mingo coal fields in West Virginia, several units of the Federal troops sent into the district have been returned to their usual stations. Most of the miners have retained their arms, however, and further trouble is feared.

EXCLUSION OF ALIENS UPHELD. The right of American immigration officials not only to detain aliens arriving after the quota of their country has been filled but to exclude them, was upheld by a decision of Judge Julian W. Mack in the United States District Court in New York. The right to divide the annual quota into twelve monthly parts also was sustained.

RUSSIA REJECTS ALLIED INQUIRY. The Bolshevik Government has refused the request of the Allied Supreme Council for permission to send a committee into Russia to investigate famine conditions, on the ground that the committee might seek to spy out Russia's weaknesses. The first American food shipments have reached Russia and are being distributed under the supervision of Hoover aids.

JAPAN SEEKS PARLEYS WITH CHINA. The Japanese government has renewed its efforts to open negotiations with China regarding the relinquishment by Japan of Tsingtau and other parts of the Shantung peninsula, and has offered to define the scope of the negotiations, the point on which China previously had insisted before joining in parleys. Japan claims large "economic rights" in the peninsula.

CENTENNIAL PEACE PORTAL OPENED. A century without fortifications or armies along the 3,000 miles of the United States-Canadian boundary was commemorated with the dedication at Blaine, Wash., of the Peace Portal, a huge arch on the boundary line.

You Are a Christian!

You have often made financial sacrifices for the cause of Christ.

You have done so because Christ has become the great center of your life, and because you know that when you go to meet Him after a while the size of your bank account will be an altogether irrelevant matter, both to Him and to you.

There will be only your naked soul and Christ!

There will be only the spiritual!

For that reason you have learned to change your material possessions, as much as possible, into spiritual assets.

For that reason you are accustomed to make financial sacrifices for a spiritual purpose.

We Would Ask You to Sacrifice Once Again.

We realize times are hard just now, and many people have a difficult time in trying to make a decent living. But you will agree with us that a sacrifice made under such conditions has a larger spiritual value than one that is made in more favorable circumstances. For that reason we call upon rich and poor alike to make this sacrifice.

The cause for which we plead is great and noble. Please judge for yourself:

A few weeks ago the RELIGIOUS PRESS BUREAU OF AMERICA was established in Chicago for the purpose of supplying RELIGIOUS EDITORIALS and other Christian matter to the daily newspapers of the country. Dr. John Clover Monsma, formerly editor-in-chief of the American Daily Standard, Chicago's Christian daily newspaper, was the founder. The newspapers pay a small amount weekly for the material sent out by the Bureau, and with that money the Bureau does its business.

The following daily papers are now being served by the Religious Press Bureau of America: THE BOSTON POST, THE DETROIT NEWS, THE PITTSBURG DISPATCH, THE ALBANY TIMES-UNION, THE PASSAIC HERALD, THE WILLIAMSPORT SUN, THE ROCKFORD MORNING STAR.

By means of these daily papers we are reaching two million people with Christian literature every week.

Does that look like IMPORTANT MISSIONARY WORK?

Our promotion work is still continuing and will continue for a long time to come. We are endeavoring to get HUNDREDS of dailies and weeklies on our list in the course of time. No one will dispute the statement that here we have struck

The one great unused means for the promotion of Christianity in our American world.

In order that the Bureau may be able to carry on its work thoroughly and successfully, it is necessary that the Christians of this land get back of it. You, servants of the King of Glory, we want you all to become ASSOCIATE MEMBERS of this Bureau. It makes no difference who you are or what your position is, we want you all to join in this great undertaking.

An Associate Membership in the Bureau will cost you TEN DOLLARS. For that money you will receive, first, an Interim Receipt, and thereafter a certificate of membership. You will receive, FREE OF CHARGE, EVERY WEEK, copies of all the material which the Bureau sends out. In addition you will receive periodical reports concerning the activities of the Bureau and the progress made.

If you think your ten dollars can do more good for the cause dear to us all somewhere else, do not send the money. But if you think differently, please send it, and send it quickly. Try to do it some way. Be a means in God's hand to help us reach the great masses of this land. Millions never see the inside of a church. But practically everybody reads the daily paper. Help us put the great message of Christianity into the hands of everybody, rich and poor, young and old, native and foreign-born. Please make your checks and money orders payable to the RELIGIOUS PRESS BUREAU OF AMERICA.—(Adv.)

The bureau is in need of representatives in all parts of the country. Applications are cordially invited.

Only the Best Bonds

are good enough for the investment of the money which you have saved and upon which you will depend for future income.

The securities which we offer are the obligations of some of the largest and soundest companies in this country, with established credit and demonstrated earnings.

You can buy them for cash, or on our Easy Payment Plan (10% down and 10% a month) which allows you to pay for them out of your future savings. This is an excellent way to save money.

Free Circulars for Investors

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address, on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2, describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices. Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To Invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co., 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent. are described in Circular 28.

Deere & Co., 10 year gold notes to yield 8.40%. Business, farm implements. Founded by John Deere in 1837. Ask for circular No. 51.

Circular No. 50 gives complete information on Federal Farm Loan Bonds. They pay 5% and are tax exempt.

Farm Mortgages—details also circulars regarding 6 per cent. First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Send for Circular 38.

Foreign Bonds—opportunities for obtaining Foreign Municipal Bonds with yearly drawings at par giving high average yield of 12½ per cent.—Danish Internal Loans, Norwegian and Scandinavian Bonds. Booklet 48.

A few Christian Herald readers who are in fullest sympathy with its aims and possibilities may be given an opportunity to purchase a limited amount of Christian Herald 7 per cent. preferred stock. If interested write for details.

Bonds—questions answered, terms defined. A very valuable non-technical booklet that every prospective bond buyer should have. No. 42.

pleasant sitting-room awaiting a notable visitor.

The appointment had been made by a special delivery letter, received twenty-four hours ago. She re-read it now with the vague purpose of preparing herself for the interview. The letterhead was engraved in capitals:

"WOMAN'S LEAGUE FOR CHRISTIAN UNITY."

"DEAR MRS. HAILE:

"Can you, without inconvenience to yourself, spare me an hour or two of your valuable time on Tuesday forenoon, March the tenth? I wish very much to confer with you upon several matters of interest to us both and to many others. I have delayed doing this in consideration of the countless calls upon you within the last few months, made by the illness of your dear children and the labors imposed by the establishment of your household in a new home. I entreat you now not to grant my request if the act will entail additional care upon yourself. I wish that we, your friends and co-workers in the League, could lift the burden in some degree. You will let us make the effort, will you not?"

"May I ask you to telephone your reply as soon as this is received?"

"Faithfully yours,

There could be but one reply. The church people had been marvelously considerate of her during the three months which had settled her and her household gods in the new and commodious quarters appointed to them. Whenever a helping hand could win the title in the business of transportation and the attendant labors, it was extended tactfully and readily. She had never imagined that the toilsome work could be executed so swiftly and with so little expenditure of personal worry and energies.

Early in January, the ten-year-old boy and his eight-year-old sister were taken down with scarlatina, and, while the attack was mild, the house was quarantined for a fortnight, and the mother subjected to an added load of care and solicitude that told visibly upon her brave, blithesome self. The ordeal was safely and happily over, and the domestic machinery was in normal running order.

A round of social duties in the form of Church Receptions at private houses had not been onerous. She confessed to her husband an hour before the receipt of Mrs. Wingate's note that she was getting through the process of acclimation far sooner than she had anticipated. She muttered to herself in the second perusal of the dainty sheet of paper, what she would not have breathed to Stuart: "I might better have said 'inoculation!'"

She refolded the note and thrust it into a drawer.

SHE had braced herself to go through with the so-called conference without flinching. That she would require a reserve of courage and forbearance to enable her to bear her part creditably, she did not question for one instant. The nameless, subtle safeguard we term idly "womanly intuition," had set her on the defensive whenever she had met Mrs. Wingate. Not even to kindly Mrs. Barrows had she intimated this. She resolved only never to let Stuart suspect it.

"The Lord do so to me and more also, if I transgress in this thing!" she had had occasion to repeat a thousand times. The vow was like a warning refrain in her ears now. She picked up her sewing the better to fight off the haunting demon of distrust and misgiving.

The minutes slipped by, bringing the appointed hour painfully near. She laid by her work and looked around the pretty room, forcing herself to fancy how it would impress a critical beholder. The March sunshine fell obliquely, but brightly athwart a large Wardian case which filled the window jutting from the front of the house. The broad triple sashes admitted a flood of light. The wall at the back of the room was lined with breast-high bookcases protected by glass doors that reflected the glory of the day. The top of the case was raised revealing a wealth of native and exotic ferns. It had been a birthday gift in September from her most valued friend in Marlinton, Mrs. Lawson, and had borne the transportation to the city marvelously well. As she leaned over it now, the smell of the green and growing things brought up reminiscences she would not trust herself to welcome. Other tokens of the love of her former associates were in the luxurious armchair set at a convenient angle to the window near her work-stand, and a fine water-color of the "thatched-roofed cottage" hung against the wall where she could see it whenever she glanced up from sewing or book. There were days when the sight of it smote her to the heart, others when it was a tonic.

Mrs. Wingate was punctual, as became a woman of affairs.

"Fifteen minutes wasted in the morning multiply into an hour by night," was one of the numerous sayings that had won and kept for her the reputation of facile and happy speech.

One slipped musically from her tongue by the time she had laid aside her fur cloak and resigned it to the waiting hands of the hostess. "And the name of that chamber was 'Peace!' Dear old John Bunyan's words come to me whenever I enter this room! It is a veritable change of air that strengthens me for days afterward." She sank into the easy chair designated by the other.

"You are very good to let me come to you when you must be overwhelmed with cares. They must have accumulated fearfully during the illness of the blessed children and the tiresome quarantine. I need not inquire if they are quite well again. I saw them in church yesterday and both looked radiantly healthy. I shall have more to say of them presently?"

DRAWING from a silver netted hand bag a set of ivory tablets attached to a slender gold chain, she slipped aside the outer one and consulted the next. The smile with which she met Mrs. Haile's look of inquiry was self-congratulatory.

"The first and most important, as it is the most pleasant duty with which I am charged today, is to inform you that at the annual meeting of the Woman's League for Christian Unity on Monday you were unanimously—I should say 'by acclamation' elected its Vice-President. May we not hope for your acceptance and that we may have your cordial co-operation with the Executive Committee in our future operations?"

"I am conscious of the honor the League has done me," began the pastor's wife. "I hope you will not think me ungracious when I ask to know something more definite as to the work that will be expected of me before I decide what I can do to meet your wishes?"

The little speech sounded stiff, but the tablets and the official tone of the announcement trammelled utterance.

"I anticipated just that answer. I should make the same in the circumstances," the Leading Lady hastened to assure her. "Until within the last ten years the various societies represented in our church—the Foreign and Domestic Missions, the Charitable Society, the Sunday-school Union and others—were separate organizations and the Charitable Society having in charge the poor and afflicted members of the parish bore the old-fashioned title common all over the country of the 'Ladies' Aid Association.' A term as awkward as it is indefinite."

Mrs. Haile interposed a comment: "I know. We worked very happily and successfully under that name in Marlinton."

"Precise-ly! Some of us awoke to the disadvantages and as a result of several conferences and prayerful deliberations we finally combined all branches of church work under the head of the League for Christian Unity—a title that conveys in a few words the purpose and end of all the associations represented in our parish. You, dear Madam, are elected to fill the place of Mrs. Martin, who had removed from the city.

"As to your share in the work, it will be a great pleasure to me to acquaint you at any convenient time with the details of the office. We shall be very considerate of your comfort and engagements in all and every possible way. In fact—ingratiatingly—you will occupy the post of an Advisory Committee of One to which we may refer in perplexity."

"You are very kind!" Despite pre-conceived prejudices and secret misgivings, the listener could not but confess the caller's fascination of manner and speech. "Nothing is further from my mind than to shirk any duties which it would be an honor and a delight to fulfill. As soon as I have consulted my husband, you shall have a definite reply."

MRS. WINGATE slipped another tablet aside.

"I had a call, yesterday from Miss Lake, the superintendent of the Infant Department of our Sabbath School. She has been hoping to have the pleasure of enrolling your boy and girl among her dear little ones. Or, at least, the little girl. Perhaps Master Stuart—so nice that he has his father's stately name!—is too advanced in age to be numbered among the infants?"

"If the sessions of the Sunday school were held in the afternoon," Mrs. Haile replied, "both of my children would attend regularly, now that they are well again. As it is they are too young to sit for an hour and a half in a class and then go directly into church for another service of the same length. I think that parents are remiss in not training children from early infancy to comprehend that the sanctuary consecrated to the worship of God is as much Our Father's house as when our Lord drove the money changers from the temple and when He attended the services in the synagogue regularly. And in what way can this be done better than by going to church?"

Horror and incredulity struggled for the mastery in the listener's face.

"Dear, dear Mrs. Haile! You can not mean that I shall take back to our superintendent the message that you do not mean to send your children to her! Think of the fatal influence of the example!"

Her overwrought excitement calmed Anita. She spoke earnestly, but without resentment at the implication:

"By no means. As soon as Stuart is twelve years old I shall enter him in a Bible Class, and I shall do the same with his sister. I am training them with a direct purpose for the instruction they are to receive in the school. I devote more than an hour to the task every Sunday morning. We call it 'the quiet hour,' and it is hard to say which of us enjoys it most. We are reading the Bible in course—selecting such portions as carry on the history we would study. And we talk over what we have read, asking and answering questions that occur to us. All this fosters thought in the young minds."

"Pardon the digression! but this is a subject that is like a part of my very life. I entered a Bible class at twelve; at sixteen I was the teacher of a class of younger girls. I have never been out of the harness since. My Bible class of working-girls was one of the strongest ties of our former charge."

"I have heard of that!" more gently than she had yet spoken. "It was a branch of Domestic Missions. Miss Maynard has two such that meet upon alternate weeks with her in her own home. We established her in a larger and more central location purposely that she should do this. She interests them in sewing for the destitute in our Home Missions, too. You will be interested in her reports to the Executive Committee. She is a remarkable person in her own sphere."

"You speak of the strain of Sunday school upon young minds. That is the reason for letting the children go home at the conclusion of the morning service."

"We meet them trooping homeward—or elsewhere—every Sunday," responded Mrs. Haile quickly and emphatically. "An invalid friend of mine—whose windows overlook a large vacant lot rented out as a tennis court and a ball-ground—tells me that it is the rendezvous for Sunday-school boys and girls between eleven and half-past twelve every week when the weather is tolerably fine. Sometimes the children become so uproarious that the neighbors have called in a policeman to quell the disturbance. All this seems very terrible to me. Perhaps because I have obsolete and provincial notions upon such matters."

IF SHE meant to be slightly satirical the dart fell short of the target. The President of the Woman's League for Christian Unity was immune.

"It is simply abominable and a disgrace to the community!" she said gravely. "The question of occupying children properly upon the Lord's Day is replete with difficulties. In some churches the Children's Sermon, as a prelude to the regular discourse of the forenoon, has been adopted as a partial cure for the trouble. It was tried in our church for a while about ten years ago. The duty was assigned to Mr. Hicks, then the associate pastor, and the plan worked well enough so far as most of us could see, for nearly a year. Mr. Hicks took a text and gave a nice little talk, never more than twelve minutes long, and a verse of a hymn was sung, during which the children filed out quietly, and we settled down to listen to Dr. Stenson's sermon proper."

"Then came a break. At a meeting of clergymen, the Children's Sermon fell under discussion. And your—our friend—Dr. Barrows was constrained by conscience or whim to speak his mind against the newly established practice. He said that it was 'ladling out pious pap, warranted not to injure infants' stomachs, instead of dispensing the sincere Milk of the Word.' For his part, he would have no such innovation upon sacred customs in his church. As was to be expected, the saying ran like a prairie fire through the press and gossip-circles, and virtually killed the sermonette in several other places. If it had not had this effect in the Banner Church, a speech of Mr. MacArthur would have put the small talk out of business. He took—or made—an opportunity at a supper given by the League on Dr. Stenson's birthday to say that here was a new fulfillment of prophecy. We read in Holy Writ that 'a little child shall lead them.' I have noticed that every little child that goes out of church when the small talk is over leads a bigger brother or sister, presumably to the ball-ground or the soda fountain."

Anita's girlish laugh blended with the silvery peal that ran the musical gamut before the Leading Lady was again the official.

"This is flippant and I am afraid not quite reverent," she said, referring to the tablets. "I ought to be ashamed of myself, but your flattering way of receiving my nonsense tempted me beyond limits. I may then convey to the anxious Executive Committee the glad tidings of your consent to be one of us? Thank you a thousand times! And I am to explain to the Superintendent of the Primary Department that she may confidently expect to see your fine children enrolled upon the list of Sabbath-school students in the fulness of time."

The fine eyes went back to the tablets. "Miss Maynard!" her forehead wrinkling in perplexity as she read the name. "What did she ask me to speak of? Ah! I recollect! You have done some parish visiting with her. There are one or two things she would like to discuss with you when you can find time to see her. I advised her to telephone for permission to call!"

SHE looked up expectantly as the sound of a closing door was followed by rapid foot-falls upon the stairs. There was a light tattoo upon the panels of the sitting-room door and simultaneously with the turning of the bolt a voice called out gayly:

"It is I, sweetheart!"

The wife arose with a vivid blush and a little embarrassed laugh.

"Come in, my dear! You will be glad to see Mrs. Wingate!"

The master of the house was flushed by a walk in the March wind. He had never looked the man he was more attractively than in meeting the visitor's outstretched hand with a cordial grasp and smiling down into her upturned face illumined by gratification she did not attempt to disguise.

"This is a coincidence!" she cried merrily. "Or is it telepathy? I was about to inquire if you were at home to transient callers, hardly daring to hope for a favorable answer. Not that I have any especial errand to you. Mrs. Haile was so kind as to grant me an hour of her morning and was yet more gracious in listening to my chatter. I told my chauffeur to be here at twelve o'clock. Did you see the car at the door?"

"You have still eight minutes to give us," laughed Stuart, leading her back to her chair. "We will watch from the window for him. I am fortunate beyond my deserts in chancing to look in upon Mrs. Haile on my way downtown to keep a luncheon engagement with an old friend." He turned to his wife.

"Mr. Lawson, my dear, is in town for the day and wishes me to lunch with him. Excuse me, Mrs. Wingate, for intruding my private engagements upon you in the few minutes I have for the enjoyment of an unexpected pleasure. But I knew Mrs. Haile would keep the children waiting for their luncheon if I were not here, and you know that school children have but an hour's 'nooning.' I hope that you are quite well?"

"Never better! and seldom more contented with the world in general, and let me add out of the depths of a full heart—never more happily satisfied with the prospects of the Banner Church. My dear Mrs. Haile!" she interrupted herself to say—"I am sure I heard a car stop at your door. May I look out? You might not recognize my chauffeur"—waving both her hosts back in tripping to the window. "Ah, yes, I was right. Mr. Haile, you will agree with me, I hope in recognizing as another coincidence—a stroke of fortune for me! the arrival of my car in time for me to take you downtown. I am going in that direction, myself, and do not enjoy solitary drives."

The wife looked down from the window, standing out of eye-range of those below, as Stuart, hat in hand in the old school courtesy that imparted dignity and graciousness to his manner, handed the mistress of the limousine into her seat, following her and leaning forward to wave a farewell to herself. He could not see her, but Anita's heart throbbed the more quickly that he knew she was watching him. The habit was not easily broken.

"YOU told us last Sunday that there are no such mistakes as accidents or happenings or chances, lucky or unlucky, in God's universe," began Mrs. Wingate by the time the wheels began to revolve. "I have always believed this and tried to hold it for certain as the creeds have it—but you made it so clear that none of us could doubt for an instant that as surely as the hairs of our heads are all numbered, the tiniest incident in the daily life of the humblest human being is as certainly 'ordained' as the fate of an empire. Don't interrupt me"—for his hand was slightly raised as in deprecation. "I am about to add a morsel of confirmation to your assertion. I have been longing all day for an opportunity of telling you a story that came to my knowledge last evening."

The preface introduced the anecdote of the encounter and reconciliation of the whilom enemies in front of the Marlinton Inn and within hearing of two members of the Committee deputed by the Banner Church to investigate the claims of the country-town pastor upon the suffrages of the metropolitan parish.

The narrator was a skillful raconteur and tactful in her choice of an audience. She forbore to mix the simple version of the story with flattering digressions. It should be enough to relate the episode of "fair profits and quick returns" in artistic style and let it work its way into the imagination of her companion.

They were at his destination before she had finished. Haile was to meet his friend at one. There was still time for a turn in the March sunshine, and she gave an order to the chauffeur.

At five minutes of one her escort bade her "Good-by."

"Some day words may be given me to thank you as I would for the refreshing draught you have held to my lips," he said hastily. "God bless you for it!"

As he stepped to the sidewalk she leaned forward, her face and figure framed in the open door, making a striking tableau, as more than one passer-by noticed.

"Despise not the day of small things!"

Beaming eyes and significant intonation supplied quotation-marks.

Young People's Topics for Oct. 2

By REV. RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN

Thy Will Be Done—With My Time

E. L. C. E. and B. Y. P. U. Matt.

IT TAKES time to live a devoted and consistent Christian life. "Take Time to be holy" are the words of an old hymn. This topic affords a fine opportunity for self-examination. Let us all inquire, not of each other, but of ourselves, "How much time do I devote to the promotion of God's Kingdom?" We shall be surprised to learn how little we are really doing in the energetics of the Kingdom in comparison with the many things we are doing daily for the promotion of our own interests and the building of our own petty kingdoms.

Are we Sunday Christians only? Or are we every-day Christians? The services that are held on Sunday should be an inspiration and preparation for the services that should be rendered every day. How may we devote more of our time to the extension of God's Kingdom? By doing more of God's will. More of God's will may be done by:

Visiting the sick; writing letters of cheer; planning bigger programs for the local chapter; raising funds for missions; promoting a wholesome social life by frequent entertainments that combat the abnormal and unhealthy recreations of the world; doing one's daily work, in the home, business, wherever we may be and whatever our task, faithfully and well; by being kind whenever kindness is needed, and kindness is needed every day. The ways in which to dedicate time for God's service are innumerable. In short, we do God's will with our time when we regard all life, every honest deed, and every day as holy, sacred and shot through and through with the finite. We are not only to think seriously on the theme: "The Christian Use of Spare Time" but also: "The Christian Use of All Time." Time is what we live in. We should make the best use of it. The end of Time is the beginning of Eternity. Let us not step into Eternity with little to our credit, but with our arms laden with the sheaves of accomplishment.

Life is short. Make it count. Much needs to be done toward the removal of the hurt and hindrance so prevalent everywhere. Everybody can do much toward the making of a better day. As a prayer of self-dedication we suggest the use of Frances K. Havergal's great hymn, beginning with those beautiful and surrendering words,

"Take my life, and let it be,
Consecrated, Lord to thee;
Take my moments and my days;
Let them flow in ceaseless praise;
Take my hands, let them move
At the impulse of thy love,
Take my feet and let them be,
Swift and beautiful for thee."

The Rainy Day

Often It Gives One a Chance to Catch up with Life

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"Oh," said Ella, looking happily out of the window, "how glad I am that it's raining!"

I laid down my book with a bang. I glanced questioningly first at Ella and then at the low-hanging clouds. And then—

"Just what," I asked none too gently, "are you talking about?" For I, you see, was not at all glad that it was raining!

Ella returned my questioning glance with a smile.

"Of course I know that this weather is a disappointment to you," she said. "You were planning some sort of an excursion, weren't you? Of course, I know it's a disappointment—to you! But to me—well, I love rainy days. They give me such a chance—"

I interrupted. "A chance?" I questioned. "What-ever do you mean by a chance? A chance to get wet—or to take cold? Or to—"

It was Ella's turn to interrupt. "Don't be foolish," she told me. "I mean a chance to catch up with ever so many things. With my sewing, and my mending, and my knitting. And with work like that. When the weather's fine I have no time to do those little necessary things—there's always so much else to fit into sunny days. It's only when it's raining—with a good, steady, very wet rain—that I can make myself feel content to darn stockings, and polish stoves, and knit sweaters, and dust chairs."

Still with a shade of resentment I stared out of the window at the falling drops. But I was thinking very hard. I was thinking of my overcrowded work-basket, of the pillow covers that I was planning to finish, of a certain batch of spice cookies that I had promised to make. When I spoke, my tone was more resigned.

"I guess, Ella," I said slowly—it's sometimes hard to admit a wrong point of view—"I guess that you're right. A rainy day, if it's met in the right spirit, is something to be thankful for. It does give one a chance to catch up. And I'm going home, now, to do some 'catching up!'"

WE USUALLY do resent rainy days. For we were born, we people of the earth, to a heritage of sunshine. There's a little rhyme that ever-so-small children sometimes say when it's raining. It goes like this, in a supplicating sing-song:

"Rain, rain, go away—
Little Margaret wants to play!"

(The name, of course, is changed to meet the demands of the occasion. It may be Jimmy or Sally or Martha!)

I used to say the words over and over, hoping that the rain would pay heed to me and stop. But it usually went right on—until it was tired, or through!

Most children dislike rainy days. And many grown-ups who are children, really, at heart—dislike them, too. Most children and grown-ups dislike rainy days and never pause to realize what rainy days mean to the world. For they mean a great deal—so much that we could not struggle along without them. They mean crops, and forests—they mean fertile lands, and prosperity, and health. It was lack of rain that brought the famine to China. And lack of rain has fostered many another disaster.

The rainy days of life, too, are like the rainy days of the world. The days when the sun of happiness and wealth does not shine are all for a purpose. For they enrich the soul, and they bring understanding to the heart. A life without its quota of rain would be like a famine-swept land.

THERE was a poet who sang in one of his verses about rain. He said:

"Into each life some rain must fall,
Some days must be dark and dreary!"

He spoke truly, that poet. He knew that the laws of life demand rain—just as the laws of nature demand it. He knew that the average human being needs a stormy day—to catch up!

It isn't only the homely tasks that are made possible by the rainy day. It isn't only the full darning basket and the empty cookie jar that are benefited by a steady down-pour. It's the inside catching-up that the rainy days of life make possible, that really matters.

It's the catching-up of the spirit that matters. It's the catching up of the gallant will, and the latent ability. It's the catching up of courage, and faith, and good cheer that counts for such a lot.

As long as there's sunshine—plenty of it!—we haven't many problems to face. I don't mean just the real golden sunshine that brightens every day—I mean the sunshine of good luck and joyousness, and all the rest of it. But when the rainy days come—the days of adversity and ill-fortune—the problems come too!

And it's the problems that make us catch up with ourselves.

Some people—like Ella—are glad when it rains, for they know that things are quite bound to be accomplished. Some people hate the rain, and hide away from it, and can find no good in it. And some people make the best of it all ways.

We can't all be glad of rain—unfortunately. We haven't, all of us, such splendid natures. But we can keep from hating it. We can school ourselves to meet the stormy day—whether it be a day of genuine trouble, or a day of just rain—cheerfully and in the right spirit.

For if we meet it in the right spirit we'll find that it's an aid in catching up—really catching up—with the best things of life.

THE rain swept down on the silent earth,
And the storm clouds filled the sky;
And the trees of the forest moaned, and wept;
As the angry wind swept by.
But we sat in glow of our friendly hearth,
And we smiled in its rosy light—
And the storm seemed many a league away,
With its freight of fear and fright!

The rain of life filled our souls one day,
In our hearts black clouds hung low;
And the tears were near to our tired eyes,
And there was no steady glow
From a friendly hearth—but we bowed us down,
And our voices joined, to pray,
And all at once, with its strife and stress,
The storm seemed far away!

Spectacles

on ten days trial

Don't Send Me One Penny

I Am Going To Mail You a Pair of the Latest-Style, Extra-Large, Round-Eye, "Sight-Improving" Spectacles Absolutely Free of Charge

I want you to take a good look at the spectacles in the above heading. Notice their size and shape. Compare them with the glasses you or your friends may be wearing right now.

Notice the extra-large round eyes in these latest-style "sight-improving" spectacles. The glasses are as large and as round as a silver dollar, as you can see in the above picture; and completely cover every part of the human eye so you don't have to look over the tops of them or squint your eyes under them like you have to do when wearing the old-style small-eye spectacles for sale at stores.

These Latest-Style, Extra-Large, Round-Eye "Sight-Improving" Spectacles Have Taken the Country by Storm

Thousands of spectacle-wearers from Maine to California have quit using the old-style small-eye egg-shaped glasses and are now wearing the latest-style extra-large round-eye "sight-improving" spectacles—which have practically taken the country by storm—and I am going to send you a pair of these up-to-date glasses complete in a very neat and handsome 10 karat gold-filled spectacle frame, to try fully ten days on your own eyes in your own home without a cent in advance or even a reference.

You Can Wear These Latest-Style, Extra-Large, Round-Eye "Sight-Improving" Spectacles for Far or Near, for Reading or Looking Away Off in the Distance

As soon as you get them, I want you to put them on your eyes no matter how weak they may be from age; sit down at your fireside these cold wintry nights and you will be agreeably surprised to discover that you can again read the finest print in your newspaper or magazine; you will be able to thread the smallest-eyed needle and do the finest kind of embroidery and crocheting with them on and do it all night long if you like without any headaches or eye-pains and with as much ease and comfort as you ever did in your life.

You Can Use Them When Out Hunting, Driving or To the Movies If You So Desire

If you like to go out hunting occasionally, put on these latest-style, "sight-improving" spectacles, go out into the woods some bright sunny morning and you will be delighted to find how greatly they help you in sighting your gun and taking aim at your game.

Or if you are fond of going to the movies once in a while, you can take a seat away in the back end of the theatre—to avoid the glimmer of the lights—and you will be pleased to notice that even the smallest words and pictures on the screen look just as clear and as plain to you as though you were sitting right in the front row, with the aid of these latest-style, "sight-improving" spectacles.

Seeing Is Believing

Now I realize that it may be hard for you—or any other spectacle-wearer whose sight has become greatly weakened from age—to believe that these latest-style, "sight-improving" spectacles will again bring back to you the absolutely perfect sight of your younger days.

But you know the old saying "Seeing is believing" and I positively will not accept one single solitary penny from you until you have seen these latest-style spectacles and have found them more sight-improving to your own eyes than any spectacles you have ever bought anywhere at any price before. That is the reason why I am only asking you to fill out and mail me the coupon below, and I will immediately send you a handsome 10 karat gold-filled pair of the latest-style, "sight-improving" spectacles by mail, all charges prepaid to try fully 10 days on your own eyes in your own home without a cent in advance or even a reference.

AMERICAN SPECTACLE HOUSE, Room 10, 55th & Dorchester Ave., Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen:—I have read your liberal offer and want you to send me by mail all charges prepaid a handsome 10-karat gold filled pair of your latest-style, extra-large, round-eye, "sight-improving" spectacles complete with an up-to-date leatherette spring-back pocket-book spectacle-case which you are offering on ten days absolute free trial.

I am going to try them out for reading or looking away off in the distance, for far or near, indoors or outdoors and, in every way you have mentioned above, and if I find them all you claim them to be after ten days trial, I will pay you your advertising price of $2.85 and no more. I want you, however, to distinctly understand that if I do not find them to be right up-to-date in every respect or if they do not restore the absolutely perfect vision of my younger days, I will return them to you without a cent of pay as I don't intend to keep them unless they are much better than any spectacles I have ever used before and even then I positively will not pay for them unless I consider them a bargain at the advertising price of $2.85 which you are asking for them and you will have to take my word as final in this matter. ## Homeless! Hungry! Workless!

That is the condition of thousands of men on the Bowery today.

Remember it is not only men of New York who come here to be helped. Every city and almost every county in the United States is represented.

Surveys on September 1st by the charity organizations showed 500,000 jobless men in the city alone—500,000 with little prospect of finding a job in the near future.

Unemployment means suffering of the most poignant kind. And—

It means work and opportunity for the Bowery Mission! Because the Bowery, with its cheap lodgings, is the place toward which the man who is empty of pocket and shorn of hope inevitably turns. It is there, too, the Bowery Mission meets him and greets him; it feeds him spiritual and physical food; it helps him find work; it stimulates and encourages him; the light over the door always burns for him, and its staff are on call at any hour of the day or night.

30,000 men have gone into the Bowery Mission "down and out" and have emerged members of The Brotherhood to scatter as valued citizens into every part of the United States.

Your assistance has made these things possible.

Now the Mission needs your help again. On the night of August 29th, almost in midsummer, 250 men lined up in the eating hall for bread and coffee. The increase for the whole week over the same week last year was more than 200 per cent.

What, then, will be the demands with the coming of cold weather?

The Mission needs $25,000 to see these men through the winter.

Questions and Answers

CF. Chandler, Ariz. Ancient Chaldea, of which Nebuchadnezzar was king, was a great alluvial plain lying between the rivers Euphrates and Tigris, with the latter as its eastern boundary and the Persian Gulf as its southern. Once highly cultivated and extremely fertile, the land with its extensive system of canals supported a large population; but ages of neglect have made it a vast wilderness of marsh and jungle, and a breeding-place of miasma and pestilence. At the height of their civilization, the Chaldeans were devoted to philosophy and science, and especially to astronomy. The government was despotic, the ruler bore the title "King of kings" and his will was the supreme law. A kind of privy council, or cabinet, was known as the "King's counselors," and advised the monarch and assisted in governing the Kingdom. There were seven states or provinces, each with its governor. The language of the kingdom was what is designated as Chaldee and was of Semitic origin. The learned among the population were assembled in bodies, as in universities, for the promotion of study in the higher learning of the time. Prof. Albert T. Clay, Babylonian Dept. of Yale University, New Haven, Conn., can advise you as to the best available authorities for further information concerning their lives and customs.

D. B., Highland, Calif., writes: "I have received a copy of 'Precious Bible Promises' which I ordered some time ago, also the Christian Herald for August 6 containing George Washington's Prayer. I want to express my gratitude for both. What relation has the Government to religion? Or, putting the same question in another way: Thought precedes action, and if we are not taught to think right, our actions are apt to drift wrong and the nation pays the cost. What is the cost of crime to the Nation, and what per cent. of the crime belongs to the members of churches and Sunday schools? Is it safe for our national government to make almost no provisions for the inculcation of Christian virtues? Can they rightfully transfer that responsibility to private individuals?"

Under the Constitution, freedom of worship is the right of every citizen. There are no published statistics relative to the points indicated in your letter. The spiritual training of the young is largely in the care of the home, the churches and the Sunday schools, and these are supplemented by a large list of denominational institutions, and by such organizations as the Christian Endeavor, Epworth League, Y. M. C. A., etc. Write to the religious department of the Bureau of Statistics, Washington, D. C., and the Federal Council of Churches, New York, for available data on the religious training of the young.

Mrs. B. F., Utica, Mich., writes: "I was glad to see in the Mail-Bag of the Christian Herald more letters recommending the Family Altar in the home. I am very much in favor of this custom as it is one that we practiced and enjoyed ever since we were married, over thirty-two years ago. At first, before we had any children, I would read a chapter in the Bible. And we would both pray just before retiring. But after a few years, when the children got a little older, we found it easier to all be together in the mornings, especially as our children were all boys (four of them). I would read a chapter every morning, and Mr. F. and I would both pray. Oftentimes Sunday mornings I would read the Sunday school lesson in the Christian Herald. As the children were always very attentive at Sunday school I thought it would be a help to them in class. The boys were taught to kneel with us, which they always did, and never resented even after they got to be young men. If we had hired help, or if the boys had company or we had company, in a great many instances our visitors would show enough respect to kneel with us, and if they were older than we, and Christians, we would ask them to lead in prayer. Talking with any one as to the advisability of family worship, I would ask them 'Where are our children going to be acquainted with the Bible teachings, if they do not hear it read at home?' Only just at church, perhaps, one day out of seven, as we do not hear it read in our public schools any more as we used to. During the war, one of our boys was at Camp Custer, Mich. About nine days before the Armistice was signed, he wrote a letter home telling us he was glad we had brought him up to be a Christian for, he said, they saw much need of one being a Christian in camp, and he asked us to pray for him. Then his letter said—'I know you will. It seems as if I can hear you praying for me, as you used to for the other boys when they were away from home.' In the voyage of life, especially when storms are prevalent, it is consoling and comforting to feel that one has friends and loved ones praying for them. So may God bless the Family Altar!"

The Most Important book on Prophecy we have ever published

PROPHECY EXPLAINED

By GEORGE H. PATCH

Every reader of the Bible needs this valuable book

This is a wonderful book on Prophecy. It will be welcomed by Christian men and women everywhere. It brings solace and consolation and reassurance.

Mr. Patch has shed a flood of light on prophecy and especially on Revelation. His work cannot fail to be commended by Bible students and Christian people wherever the Bible is read and studied. It is the most important book we have ever published on Prophecy. The first edition is ready this month. All who are interested in the interpretation of Bible prophecy should read and study this remarkable work. Its publication was recommended to us by eminent students of Prophecy. We anticipate a great demand for this new book.

"This excellent book appears opportunely at a time when, more than in any previous period in modern history, Prophecy is uppermost in the minds of thoughtful men and women throughout the world. The great events of the last seven years have wrought this change. They have seen with amazement the downfall of kings, the destruction of long established dynasties, the overturning of thrones and principalities and powers; and they have been led to the inevitable conclusion that the forces of evil, which man's wickedness had let loose upon the nations, when the end of the struggle was reached, would be seen to have been halted and confounded by the Omnipotent Power, 'Who makes the wrath of man to praise Him,' and brings redress out of the very bosom of calamity and suffering."—Dr. Geo. H. Sandison.

Our object in publishing this book is not only to satisfy the very general desire for light on Prophecy, but to lay before all interested men and women in America a new and simple method of studying the whole field of Prophecy, from Genesis to Revelation, from the Creation to the Times of the End, in one study each week for a single year. These fifty-two Lessons, or Studies in one complete, cloth bound volume, we feel sure will be welcomed by all readers of the Christian Herald and their friends. It is our earnest desire to organize all of them in one great Bible Class for the study of this comprehensive and enlightening course at home. Every Lesson carries full instructions. All the ground has been gone over, all the research work done, and what is needed now is the attention of the reader in order that he or she may follow the method of study, and give due attention to the discourse of the teacher. With your reference Bible at hand, and your mind intent upon the subject under discussion, you who read this, will find no difficulty, and encounter no serious obstacles to a very clear understanding of the prophetic portions of Scripture. The time and duration of the sessions of study are yours to choose; but we know that if you begin, you will follow with zealous interest, and with Mr. Patch as guide, the whole series of studies will be mastered with such attention as always comes from full enlightenment—a result for which you may have striven before, yet never attained.

1 Vol. 12mo. Cloth, 400 Pages of Large Type

In Mr. Patch's book the reader will find a new and most satisfactory method of studying Prophecy, which will bring it within the reach of every inquirer. Light is shed upon the fulfilled Prophecies of the past, on those now in process of fulfillment, and those of which the fulfillment still lies in the bosom of the future.

This book may be adapted to a variety of uses in Bible study.

1. The arrangement is ideal for text-book use. It is divided into fifty-two lessons, with most important Bible texts, with questions to draw out the meaning, and spaces after each question for answers.

Each lesson is followed by copious explanatory notes, quoting authorities and giving clear interpretations of Prophecy contained in the Bible. Its contents make it especially valuable to each member of a Bible class.

2. Every Sunday-school teacher will find the study of the book an invaluable aid in teaching classes.

3. All readers of the Bible will find the book a great aid to a clear understanding of the Bible, especially for the references on prophecy. No one who reads and studies the Bible can afford to be without this valuable book.

"'Prophecy Explained' reveals an unusual knowledge of prophecy both from the Biblical point of view and also of wide reading. The author's exposition and conclusions are evidently the result of much careful and thorough study. In my judgment the book will prove a valuable and practical addition to the books already published on the subject of prophecy."

From a critical review by a well-known Bible teacher recommending the book to the Christian Herald for publication in book form.

Learn to make doughnuts as dainty as cake

DOUGHNUTS need not be tough, tasteless, greasy and indigestible if you mix them properly and fry them the right way in the right kind of fat.

To keep doughnuts from cracking, the dough should be mixed very soft.

To keep the dough from becoming grease-soaked, two things are necessary: The recipe must contain enough egg in proportion to the flour, and the frying fat must impart its heat instantly to the crust. Then egg and fat combine to form a coating that keeps the fat out and the flavor in.

See that the frying kettle contains ample fat so that the heat will not be reduced below proper frying temperature when the cold, raw doughnuts are dropped in. Then the doughnuts will be cooked through. The fat should not smoke at frying heat, because when fat smokes it decomposes and forms an irritating, indigestible substance that is deposited on the food.

So the doughnuts will cook evenly and be fine in texture, turn them frequently after they rise to the top of the fat. They should be drained on soft paper, a process which leaves them as greaseless and dainty as cake, if the right kind of frying fat has been used.

ORANGE KNOTS—a new kind of doughnut

|--------------------------------|--------------------------------------|
| 3 tablespoonfuls Crisco        | 4 cupfuls sifted flour,              |
| $\frac{1}{4}$ cupful sugar     | $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoonful salt,      |
| 1 egg and 1 yolk, beaten       | $1\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoonfuls cream of |
| light                          | tartar                               |
| grated rind 1 orange           | $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoonful soda       |
| $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoonful mace | $\frac{1}{2}$ cupful milk            |

Cream the Crisco, beat in the sugar, the eggs, orange rind and mace. Sift together the dry ingredients; add the first mixture and the milk and mix to a firm dough. Cut off bits of the dough and roll under the fingers into strips the shape and length of a lead pencil, tie in a knot or shape like an 8 and fry in hot Crisco; drain on soft paper, and dredge with confectioners' sugar.

Experienced cooks say that Crisco is the best fat for doughnuts because its qualities make it easy to carry out the above suggestions for perfect frying. Crisco does not smoke at frying heat, yet it gives up its heat instantly, so that the protecting crust is formed at once on the food being cooked. Crisco cooks away so slowly, and can be used so often that you need not hesitate to put plenty in the frying kettle. Finally, it is a dainty, greaseless, tasteless, digestible vegetable product that is used in the most delicate cakes. It does not give doughnuts that "fatty" flavor which so often spoils their taste.

Try a batch of doughnuts fried in Crisco according to these suggestions, and see how really delicious doughnuts can be.

Your grocer sells Crisco, in dust-proof, wrapped containers, holding one pound or more, net weight. Use it for frying, for pastry, for cakes.

The Grand Lamas of Thibet

Strange Rulers of a Land of Mystery

By

DR. THOMAS EDWARD GREEN

CENTURIES ago the wise and far-seeing Emperor of China, with millions of men and masses of material at his command, undertook to guarantee the soil of his Empire as inviolable by building the long reaches of the mighty abric of the Great Wall, that, through valley and plain, over torrential rivers and up the sides of jagged mountains, stretches across the northern frontier of China. It sufficed for protection during the days of hand-to-hand conflict. It was a protection even through the Middle Ages when catapults, Greek fire and sealing towers prepared the way for the coming of gun-powder as a means of battle. But age and advancing invention speedily made the Great Wall of China but a monument, and opened her frontiers to the advance and entrance of friend and foe alike.

What man failed to accomplish for China nature has done for Thibet. A lofty plateau, in area about the size of France, it lies at a mean elevation of sixteen thousand feet. It is hedged about by mountains so vast that they have been an impassable barrier through all the centuries, save only through passes themselves so difficult as to baffle all save the most skilled and accustomed travelers. These mountains are so vast as to laugh defiance in the face of self-confident aviation, for no daring pioneer has yet ventured to fly across the summits of Everest, or even to trust himself above the mighty masses of Kunchinjunga.

Behind these massive barriers lies Thibet, for centuries a mystery; even down to our own time known as the "Hermit Kingdom," lying on the roof of the world, with a people, language, literature and religion that are all peculiar to itself.

While the country has been, since 1720, under the control of China, it has been the policy of that government to isolate Thibet as much as possible, probably with the idea of creating a buffer state against European invasion from that direction. At any rate Thibet remains still, in spite of expeditions—scientific, military, and otherwise—largely a land of mystery.

It is probably for this reason that a certain type of literature, built upon a fatuous philosophy that possesses a peculiar attraction for certain types of minds, has made Thibet the dwelling-place of Mahatmas and Masters and Mysterious Brotherhoods, whose powers and achievements rival those of Zoroaster in Bulwer's story of a generation ago.

THERE is nothing more indicative of a peculiar twist in the human mind than the easy credulity with which people believe these wonder stories. Not only do the founders and promulgators of all phases of spiritualism and various types of occult rickery talk learnedly about monasteries on the slopes of the Himalayas and monastic centers in the heart of Thibet, but one now and again meets people who are willing to confirm their personal knowledge of these places from which venerable men, supernaturally preserved from century to century, pass out in their astral bodies, appearing on the streets of San Francisco, London, or New York, where after performing various deeds of marvelous sagacity, miraculous insight or magic power they afterwards vanish, leaving behind them a faint perfume of sandalwood or some other Oriental perfume, or perhaps if one is inclined to be particularly poetical, the leaves of a lotus flower or a spray of cassia blossoms.

It is like scores of other things with which one comes in contact. I have traveled all over India and the Orient vainly searching for one of those marvelous fakirs, who was supposed to out-rival all the magical cunning and legerdemain of our Western world. I searched up and down the length and breadth of India for a man who would do for me the much-talked about and highly praised trick of throwing a rope in the air and having a little boy climb it until he vanishes from sight; then with a spatter of blood the four quarters of the dismembered child fall out of the sky, which, being gathered together and put into a basket, are carried off by an attendant while almost instantly, with a merry laugh, the child comes running around the corner of a nearby building.

I talked with judges and princes, governors and rulers, priests and merchants, Hindoos, Mohammedans and Buddhists—every sort and kind of folk that I could discover—and they all told me that such a thing had never been done. And yet during the last ten days that I was in India, and while I was en route by steamer from Colombo to Hongkong, I met six different people who told me that they had seen that thing with their own eyes actually accomplished.

I did find a fakir in Agra who undertook to do the mango-tree stunt for me: planting a seed in the ground and covering it over with a little tent and making it grow in twenty minutes from a seed to a tree bearing blossoms and fruit. His "medicine," however, wasn't working very well that day, and his attempt at magic would have made the average vaudeville magician in America blush with shame.

BUT in regard to Thibet. I have come in contact, during a good many years of quiet investigation of things occult and supposedly supernatural, with at least half a dozen persons, apparently sensible, logical and presumably truthful, who have told me that they had been in personal touch with these venerable men who had come from the monasteries among the Himalayas, or at least in Thibet, for the purpose of either bringing wonderful messages, preaching startling gospels, performing thrilling events, mainly, however, be it admitted for the purpose of giving some sort of a mystic seal to the claims of the person telling the story. In every case there was, of course, the particularly mysterious touch of these venerable brethren leaving their physical bodies behind in their monasteries, and traveling through space over continents and seas in defiance of all the accepted laws of the natural world.

I have never been in Thibet, but it happened that in 1912 I stumbled on to a piece of Thibet that had come out through the mountains and revealed itself in the modern world. It was just following the revolution in China, when, under the leadership of Dr. Sun Yat Sen, the power of the Manchu Dynasty broke and the Chinese Republic was established.

Some of the lamas of Eastern and Northern Thibet were inclined to resist certain demands that the newly established government of China made upon them, whereupon several regiments of Republican troops, equipped in modern fashion, marched into Thibet, and, having properly disciplined and reduced to order the recalcitrant lamas, proceeded to Lhasa. Before their approach the ecclesiastical sovereigns of the realm fled post haste, and crossing all but impassable mountains to the south descended to India and came to Darjeeling, asking sanctuary of the English Government there.

A Buddhist priest

It was just at this particularly interesting juncture that I chose to come up from Calcutta to Darjeeling, with nothing more pretentious in mind than a view of the mighty mountains, generally easily obtained from this point.

HERE I met a young photographer, who had been employed by one of the great news collecting agencies, taking pictures of the Durbar just concluded at Delhi. He had heard of the flight of the Grand Lamas over the mountains, and had come as quickly as trains would bring him to Calcutta and up to Darjeeling in hopes of procuring some unique photographs.

It was not possible for me to accompany him when he finally obtained permission to make the pictures. In fact, he never told me just how he obtained access to the two men, who, perhaps in all the world, are the most secluded and the hardest to reach, the Dalai Lama and the Tashi Lama of Thibet. I have an idea, however, that when their Highnesses fled from Lahasa, together with their Ministers of State and a certain following of their court, they did not have time to prepare very much for the journey nor to accumulate very much in the way of wherewithal. Thibet has neither telegraph, nor telephone nor railroads. Knowledge, therefore, of the approach of the Chinese troops did not very far precede their actual coming. I imagine, therefore, that the Minister of State was perhaps easily reached by the display and bestowal of a little English gold.

At any rate, I did not find it at all difficult a few days later to accumulate some of the rarest treasures in my possession from among the ecclesiastical belongings of some of the prelates and dignitaries who had fled to Darjeeling with their masters.

The British Government, it seems, was very willing to grant sanctuary; but, cautious of complications with China, insisted that the visiting hierarchs confine themselves to certain set limits of habitation and ask for nothing more than merely a chance to live.

The Republican Government of China found it advantageous, a little later, to restore the lamas to their place and prerogatives. It was, however, due to this peculiar combination of events that the outside world was able to catch a glimpse of what are perhaps the two most strangely chosen and secretly guarded personages in the world, and enabled me to secure the photographs which illustrate this story as well as some unique items for my collection of things Oriental.

LAMAISM is a system of combined religion and politics, a corrupt form of Buddhism that prevails in Thibet and through a certain part of Mongolia.

Thibet is not in any sense the source of spiritual authority for the Buddhist world. The real philosophical Buddhist of the Orient will tell you that Lamaism is a very degraded interpretation of primitive Buddhism, that it has combined in it not only the primitive nature worship of ancient Thibet, but that it has adopted and absorbed many things from various faiths with which it has come in contact during succeeding generations. Hinduism, Mohammedism and Confucianism have all left more or less impress upon Lamaism. It is probable that even Christianity, from a far ancient day, left behind it much in the way of symbol and service. For example, the fish, the secret sign of the early Christians, the letters of which form the initials of the word in Greek "Jesus Christ, the Son of God, the Saviour," which is found scratched upon the walls of the catacombs and ancient tombs in Rome, has for some strange and unaccountable reason become a Buddhist symbol in Thibet.

The Buddhist church of Thibet also uses bells and rosaries and relics in processions the same way as the Church of Rome. The sacred vestments worn by lamas and priests have decided reminiscence of Western ecclesiasticism, and it is extremely startling in this remote country to find processions, litanies, intercessions, holy water, with sprinklings and crossings; the kneeling of the people to the priest for the laying on of hands—things that you find nowhere else in all the Oriental world save in Thibet.

On the other hand, it is just as certain that instead of Thibet being the great center of supernatural knowledge and power, the source from which mysterious influences go out that bind the whole world in occult obedience to hidden powers, the religion of Thibet is so extremely debased as to have become very largely a matter of mere senseless reiteration. Prayer wheels and praise wheels take the place of even the most juvenile and elemental type of ritual worship.

Mixed in with it all is a sort of spiritualistic belief in devils and demons, and in consequence a distorted mixture of magic and superstition drawn from an attempt to unravel the mysterious powers of nature.

the doctrines of primitive Buddhism. Before his death more than thirty thousand of the lamas had adhered to his teaching and had put on the orange-colored garments which he declared were a symbol of the true faith, as they had been in the life-time of Buddha. He did not attempt to weaken the political authority of the Dalai Lama at Lahasa, whose followers and particular adherents wore red garments. It was a strife of doctrine, fortunately, and not of arms, and was settled in the fifteenth century by the recognition of both lamas, the one retaining his title of Dalai or "Glorious King" and the other taking his title from the monastery where the reformer had lived as abbot, being known as "The Tashi Lama." The one, therefore, is a sort of a Theocratic King, while the other is the Grand High Priest of this strange land among the clouds.

What may be the native or acquired ability of either one of these men at the present time no one is presumed to know. Their contact with the rest of the world is so faint and occasional that there are no standards of judgment to which to appeal.

A NEWSPAPER telegram, the other day, carried the intelligence that in some certain town in Mongolia "the living Buddha had died" with the implied conclusion that this personage was the representative or the reincarnation, or in some sense the embodiment of the power and authority of the founder of Buddhism.

There are many living Buddhas in the Orient. Locally they are of high authority and presumably immaculate sanctity, but the term "living Buddha" is applied to any one who, by virtue of contemplation, discipline, denial and judgment, follows the eight-fold path to such a degree of perfectness that he ceases to acknowledge any attachment to the present world and its concerns. He thus attains to the title of the "living Buddha."

The authority of the two lamas of Thibet runs in Mongolia, even though it does not hold in India, Siam and Japan.

In some way that it is very hard to explain, these supreme rulers or Grand Lamas are looked upon as incarnations of certain celestial beings, who, inspired by love for the human race, have taken the so-called "Great Resolve" to become future Buddhas or Saviours, and who, therefore, have descended from the Heavens and live earthly lives in incarnated human beings.

The Tashi Lama has come to be looked upon as the continuation of the ecclesiastical power that appeared in the great reform of Tsongkapa, while the Dalai Lama is looked upon as the incarnation of a prehistoric Buddha. When, therefore, one of these dies it is necessary for the other to ascertain in whose body the celestial being, whose outward form has been dissolved, has been pleased again to incarnate himself. For that purpose the names of all male children born just after the death of the deceased Great Lama are placed before

The Portola, the royal and religious capitol of Thibet at Lahasa

THIBET has never yet been touched by the Buddhist "Revival" that has brought the esoteric teachings of Gautama into the prominence that they have attained in the Western world. So far as all lay people, and indeed most of the monks and priests are concerned, aside from a repetition of postulates and observances their entire religious attitude is summed up in the endless repetition of the phrase "Om Mane Padmi Om" an inscription of praise to Buddha, which simply translated means "Oh! Thou Jewel in the Lotus."

The lamas and monks are not the simple teachers that one finds in Ceylon or in Burma; not the skilled and astute teachers that one encounters in China; not the spiritual leaders of the people that one discovers under royal patronage and control in Siam; not indeed the historical remains of a vanishing faith that one meets in free thinking and largely atheistical Japan. Here in Thibet the lamas are members of the most wealthy and most dominant community in the country. Directly or indirectly the church owns a great part of the land. The people pay a tax both in money and in kind. Their obedience and their generosity is demanded by the priests as a right. It is as complete a union of church and state, of ecclesiastical and temporal authority, as exists in the world today.

The fact that there are two contemporary over-lords of the church and two contemporary rulers of the realm of Thibet is due to the fact that in the fifteenth century the Emperor of China acknowledged the leaders of two sects of Buddhism as of equal authority and entitled to equal respect. It was the result of a reformation in the Buddhist faith similar in many ways to the reformation in Europe in the sixteenth century.

Tsongkapa, who has been called indeed "The Luther of Thibet," in the latter half of the fourteenth century, preached a return to simple philosophy and

CHAPTER X

A Story of a City Church

By MARION HARLAND

Illustrated by William C. McNulty

I WONDER why people telephone to me so often at meal-time!" ejaculated Mrs. Haile, leaving her chair to answer the peal that interrupted her luncheon.

"I suppose because they are pretty sure to find you at home then," rejoined her son. "It's so with everybody."

"Then everybody ought to know better than to disturb others!"

Mrs. Haile reiterated it mentally as she sat down to the instrument in the back hall and lifted the receiver to her ear.

"Yes?" She was the one out of a thousand who would not say "Hello." She held that it smacked of the street boy and the hoyden.

"Is that you, Mrs. Haile?" came the voice over the wire. "I am afraid I called you away from your luncheon, but I wanted to catch you at home. This is Miss Maynard. Mrs. Wingate advised me to ask you to set a time for seeing me. We are both such busy women that we cannot take chances in such matters. Shall you be at liberty to talk with me this afternoon? And will three o'clock be too early for me to call?"

"No, Miss Maynard. I shall be at home and quite ready to see you. And I shall keep the next hour free for you."

"Thank you ever so much! I shall be punctual. I know you have no time to waste. Good morning, and thank you!"

"I am likely to have a feast of fat things today," reflected the pastor's helpmate as she settled herself to wait for her next visitor in the room Mrs. Wingate's radiant presence had glorified five hours before. "Only it will be like the old-fashioned New England dinners my grandmother used to tell me of—in which the pudding was the first course. Now for the corned beef and cabbage!"

Her sense of humor served her still as a saving clause. As she said it, she was conscious that the sweets of the forenoon had not agreed with her digestive organs. She had not been able to think soberly and rationally of anything since the limousine had glided away from her front door. She hoped that there had not been time during the drive for the president of The League to "get in much of her fine work with Stuart." That was the way she put it. She knew how he detested "blarney."

THERE was no danger of a surfeit of sweets with the functionary who arrived, as she informed her hostess "upon the dot."

"I haven't an idea how the slang originated," she continued, "but it is expressive. And now that I am here, let us proceed at once to business." From a capacious handbag she extracted a leather-bound note-book and began to turn the leaves.

Our heroine (for if this over-true tale has a heroine it is the commonplace woman who never dreamed of applying the title to herself) could not but trace a likeness between the lean, brown volume that might have been a ledger and the owner.

The salaried visitor of the parish was a spinster of an age so uncertain that those who had known her in her official capacity for a decade could not have told whether she was nearer forty or fifty. Her cloak and gown were snuff-color and her hair, parted smoothly above a high forehead, was a darker shade of the same, dappled with gray.

"I go so much among the poor that I feel I ought to set them an example by dressing plainly," was one of her sayings. "I frown down extravagance of all kinds. It may not be wrong with the rich. In the poor, it is nothing less than a crime."

"I had a consultation with Mrs. Wingate, our well-beloved president, last week about your wish to accompany me regularly once a week upon my missions of mercy," she resumed, keeping the place in the lean ledger with a brown kid forefinger. "I told her how much interest you had taken in my sewing-classes and of the three evenings you delighted us by reading and talking to us of the mountain missions and the families of the missionaries for whom we are making up boxes. I am sure that knitting-needles and sewing machines will fly the faster for those evenings." She glanced again at her notes, a motion copied so faithfully from Mrs. Wingate that the observer could not repress a smile.

"Oh, I see! a report of your generous proposal that light refreshments—tea and bread-and-butter and cookies and the like—should be served during the evening and at your expense by the way of making the girls feel that you were their hostess—such a sweet and original idea!"

"The president said on the spot that it could not be allowed. It might be kind to have food, as no doubt some of the girls had had light suppers after working hard all day. But, if it were done, the League Treasury must bear the expense."

She had her trowel in hand and was excavating a resting-place at one end of the miniature garden for the pink beauty

Mrs. Haile interrupted her:

"Did you make her understand that the slight expense would be a contribution to domestic missions that I should be glad to add to what I usually make? I would use it as a means of getting nearer to a class in which I have been deeply interested for years. The number of self-supporting women increases every month. A large percentage of them marry in time and take their place among the wives and mothers who are to bring up the next generation. Not a few marry successful business men."

MISS MAYNARD'S grimace testified to her appreciation of the fact.

"True! very true! I wonder if you have any idea of how many society leaders that might be said?"

Mrs. Haile went on calmly:

"However that may be, it is our duty and should be our privilege to fit them for whatever station they may be called by Providence to fill. And certain finer points of breeding can only be learned by personal association with well-bred people. No machinery of man's devising can do the nicer parts of what we call for the lack of a better name 'pastoral work' without the agency of true Christian brotherhood and sisterhood. We must win all classes and conditions of men and women to the belief that

"One Family we dwell in Him.
One Church, above, beneath."

"I know you are about to remind me of social distinctions we cannot break down, and which it would be neither kind nor expedient to do away with if we could. There are common grounds upon which we should meet and labor in the fellowship."

"To be sure! to be sure!" struck in the official. "In the Lord's sight, and to a certain extent in His house, we are all equals. But there is no use trying to force all this socialistic talk we hear so much of down the throats of sensible persons. And those we think of dragging up to the level of those who move in higher social circles and have bigger incomes is rank nonsense. We all know it! And why try to smooth it over?"

Money and education buy the place in Society the world over, and the Church is no exception. And, after all, the Gospel is as free to what we call the gallery-pewites as to the middle-aisles. We mustn't forget that."

Mrs. Haile stirred impatiently.

"I never saw another church in which the gallery was divided into rented pews. I thought the seats there were always free."

"So they are in most churches. But, years ago, we found that people disliked the name of 'free seats.' It was too much like 'the poor widow's corner' in the old-fashioned meeting-houses. So they 'pewed off' the gallery and saved the pride of those who liked to have it known that they paid for their sittings."

"May not that be called 'a distinction without a difference'?"

The tone was dry. "And speaking of poor widows reminds me that I am sorry to see infirm old women and men climbing the gallery-stairs every Sunday. I was strongly tempted last Sunday to invite one very fragile-looking old lady to take her seat in my pew, but I was not sure it would be expedient. It might make her conspicuous and create talk."

Miss Maynard raised both horrified hands:

"Dear Mrs. Haile! I am so thankful you thought better of it! It would have been most unwise, and, as you say, would have made no end of talk. And the woman herself would not have understood it. She would probably not have accepted the invitation. I sincerely hope not! Which brings me to something which I feel you ought to know. You have been so friendly with some of the plain people we were speaking of just now, that they don't quite understand it. One of my class told me yesterday that you had called to see her mother, who is not able to go out of the house on account of rheumatism, and sent her some flowers besides. She and her neighbors were at a loss how to take it. They all say that you are 'not a bit stuck up,' but you have such a graceful way of making nice speeches in talking with them that they are at a loss how to answer and become embarrassed. They can't get up replies of the same kind and they are uneasy and uncomfortable. And when you have done as much visiting among plain people as I have, my dear lady, you will understand that plain people don't like to be put at a disadvantage. They have feelings and pride as well as their superiors in social standing."

SEEING that the stunned listener had no response ready—or none that civility and hospitality let her enunciate, the arbiter of churchly manners and usages ran on:

"I wonder, sometimes, just what St. Paul meant when he told us to 'condescend to men of low estate.' He wasn't writing to Americans, to be sure, and he lived in the first century instead of the twentieth, but I don't believe men of low estate liked being patronized

The Story in Brief

SILAS FORD, the dominant figure in the fashionable Banner Church in New York City, is profoundly impressed while on a visit to Marlinton, a few miles distant, by the preaching of Rev. Stuart Haile, whose ten-year pastorate there has been extraordinarily happy and successful. The leaders of the Banner Church have determined on the resignation of their pastor, Rev. Dr. Samuel Stenson, because they believe that at sixty-three he is too old for the best interests of a modern city church conducted with business-like efficiency, and Mr. Haile reluctantly accepts their call because of the larger opportunities for service. The Banner Church makes much of welcoming the Hailes and stages what its members call the "Unique Demonstration" for the retiring and the incoming pastors. Mrs. Haile finds somewhat trying a lengthy call from Mrs. Wingate, who dominates the women's activities of the church.

"World Court" of the League

IN ELECTING the World Court of International Justice, the League of Nations has taken the most important step since its creation after the close of the Great War. Of the members chosen to sit as permanent Justices, eleven are known as distinguished jurists and men specially familiar with the intricate phases of international law. John Bassett Moore, whose labors in the State Department at Washington have long made him known as an expert of international legal questions, is of this number, while Barbosa, as a member of the Supreme Court of Brazil, Finlay, as former Lord Chancellor of England, Loder of Switzerland, and Weiss of France, are all jurists of especially large experience. In choosing the Justices the League had in view the representation of as many countries as possible, with their varying legal customs and traditions.

As the World Court will be open to all nations, it promises to be a very busy tribunal from the outset. Thirty different governments are represented in the League, and when the Court begins to function, this number is likely to be increased. It will organize by the election of a president and other officers, and it is expected that within a few months it will be prepared to hold its opening sessions at The Hague, in the celebrated Peace Palace, erected by the generosity of the late Andrew Carnegie.

Several speakers before the League Assembly in the closing hours preceding the election gave sound and sensible advice. They urged that the members of the Assembly should keep a keen and watchful eye to the transaction of the League's proper business, and not allow any undue diversion toward political and humanitarian problems. The League had been used for minor purposes too much already, they charged, and had weakened its efficiency, when it should have concentrated its efforts on making war difficult and unprofitable. Some expressed the hope that the League would not hereafter permit its time and energies to be monopolized by any government, even by the great powers, while affairs affecting the world's vital interest demanded attention, and that matters dealing with world peace must take precedence over all others. These well-meant advisory speeches were made chiefly by Canadian and Australian delegates.

The new World Court will enter upon its duties at The Hague under auspices much more favorable to success than its predecessor, the Peace Tribunal, which was neglected, if not indeed rejected, by the governments which should have been its main dependence. It had no power to carry out its own findings. The new Court has behind it a group of governments representing nations that sincerely desire peace. Let us hope that all the signatories of the League will co-operate heartily in their support of the World Court, by faithfully performing their duties and standing together in upholding and executing its findings and decisions.

An Open-Letter to Premier Briand

OF ALL countries in the world that will be helped by a general world disarmament and an end of war, your own great country, France, will head the list. For during the centuries of mankind's folly in making war a part of earth's history, France has, perhaps, suffered most from the tyrannical reign of Mars.

It will, therefore, be of the utmost importance to France if at the coming Conference on Disarmament held in the United States at the invitation of President Harding, some real and permanent agreement shall be reached by the representatives gathered there, which shall at least be the beginning of the end of war among civilized nations.

The one thing, no doubt, which will be raised as an obstacle to any positive disarmament on the part of France will be the need, as she thinks, of keeping up large war preparation against the future plots of Germany.

But the friends of France in America—and they are very, very many—would suggest to you, one of the most observing and disciplined minds in Europe, that Germany, France's old enemy, is even now, not the

The Churches and Disarmament

RESPONSES from churches of practically all denominations continue to pour in, showing that the Christian Herald's appeal to the churches for united endorsement of the Conference on Disarmament and generous approval of the course of President Harding in his successful efforts to bring it about, has taken pastors, officials and congregations by storm.

As this issue goes to press, considerably more than 100 churches all over the country have been heard from, in addition to those in the list published last week, and the replies are still coming by every mail. A more detailed account of these Peace Endorsement replies will be published in our next issue.

One of the latest resolutions is particularly notable, being from a Conference of Churches, held in Baldwin, Miss., on September 9, at which the following was adopted: "Be it resolved that we the members of Christian Churches (Disciples of Christ), with their ministers and congregational officers of the Northeast District of Mississippi, now assembled in Conference in Baldwin, do hereby express our hearty approval of the action of President Harding and pledge him our support in every way and effort to bring about World Peace." Signed by J. Fred Jones, President, Robert L. Harrell, Secretary.

It is of the highest importance that all the endorsements by churches and other bodies should be in at the earliest possible moment. The following is the form of endorsement:

WHEREAS, President Harding has called a Conference on Disarmament, to be composed of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers and China, to be held in Washington, D. C., on November 11, 1921, and

WHEREAS, the Christian people of the United States of America of all denominations are by their profession of belief in the teaching and Spirit of Jesus Christ committed to the policy of World Peace and to Disarmament as a means to the accomplishment of that goal; Therefore same Germany historically. The Kaiser has fled and is a hopeless exile. The Junker element in Prussia has within the past few weeks received a most severe blow in the reaction following the assassination of Erzberger, whose death reminds the Germans of all classes of the character of militarism and the military party. Already the seeds have been sown that shall bear mighty fruit even in Germany for world-wide peace, which shall make impossible for her to attack France or any other country. The significant movement of the workingmen for peace and against Prussianism, shown by the mighty mass meetings protesting against the military hatred that killed Erzberger is a movement so powerful that statesmen of your penetration must surely take that into the account as signifying the actual possibility of no danger from Germany even if the military forces of France were to be reduced to a minimum.

BE IT RESOLVED, That we, the pastor, officers and members of _____ Church, do hereby express our hearty approval of the action of President Harding and pledge to him our support in every effort to bring about World Peace.

Added to all these historical movements must be the immense reparations the German people must pay before they can or will think of making war again. For they must pay for forty years the immense sum of $500,000,000 plus 26 per cent. of her export values, making a total of $760,000,000.

But that is less than her previous war account to keep up her army and navy, besides losing 800,000 men from the factory and field. So that the world views the astonishing fact that with COMPULSORY DISARMAMENT Germany is already economically better off than the United States, which has voted for war upkeep this coming year $830,000,000!

We wish to assure you, Premier Briand, as you come to this Conference, of the great good-will and good welcome of the American people. We earnestly hope that you, the honored representative of France, will act for the good of mankind. For the time has come in the history of the world for the nations to consider the happiness and safety of all nations. National safety and happiness depend on international safety and happiness. We take for granted that you are not coming to this momentous conference to press any particular claims of France above the claims of mankind. We also take for granted that your influence at the Conference will be for real DISARMAMENT.

Around the table we feel sure that France, so far as all other considerations may enter into the discussion, will be guided by honest statesmanship and not by degenerate diplomacy or old-time intrigue for national advantage. But in the name of a common human liberty which Lafayette saw, and for which France has so often given of her bravest and best, we welcome you as America's guest, and do not doubt that your vote will be cast for the laying down of warlike arms and the taking up of the world's implements of humane and lasting peace.

With great respect,
THE AMERICAN PEOPLE.

Just Common Sense!

IN DECLINING to eat from a solid gold dinner service at one of the leading Atlantic City hotels, President Harding did what the American people in the main must heartily approve. The service, which consisted of 1,000 pieces, and which had been expressly provided as a signal honor for the Presidential guest, however it might have been regarded in any of the European countries, was out of place in this free republic, which could not view it as other than a plutocratic display. It might have been foreseen that the President, with his customary good sense and appreciation of the proprieties, would act in the matter just as he did when he refused to permit it to be used.

"I will not eat from plates of gold," he told his entertainers, "and I wish to be furnished with the tools to which I have been accustomed." So china dishes and plated steel cutlery were substituted. Nor would he use the reserved "special suite," or the reserved autos or rolling chairs.

The man who has stuck type, and rolled proofs in a printing press, and whose highest enjoyment was to talk with his neighbors on his home porch at Marion, or to mix with the children on their parties on the White House grounds, showed plain, old-fashioned common sense in declining to make a spectacle of himself before the plain-living American people, to gratify the ambition of hotel managers. It is a safe guess that his predecessors would have acted as he did.

Unhappy Homes

A WELL-KNOWN physician, a man of wide experience and long practice, writes the editor as follows:

"In my visitation at the homes of my patients I am appalled at the number of families that I find distracted and divided by quarrels, nagging, spitefulness, bitterness between husband and wife and brothers and sisters. I wonder often if in any way these unhappy homes could be made to see the beauty of the ideal home life. Is there any way in which so many unhappy families can be changed into abodes of peace and unselfishness? It is a tragedy that I witness as I come to know certain circles in the course of my professional intimacy with families that do not conceal from me as they do from the minister or other acquaintances the inner secrets of their unhappy existence."

This is pretty strong language from a man who is not at all morbid in his observations. We cannot help wondering how true it is that a generalization could be made from this confession. Is it true that unhappy homes are quite common? Is it a fact that there are a good many such homes where nagging and bitterness and strife are a large part of the daily experience?

If it is true, as the good physician seems to think it is, then there is certainly room for some radical improvement in the home life of America. It is not a secret that is unknown to many pastors that many families in a parish thought by the average acquaintance to be ideal are in reality almost destroyed by inner dissension. A friend of the editor recently confessed that his heart was almost broke to discover an estrangement between a man and his wife, members of his church, who he had always thought were almost perfect examples of what a husband and wife ought to be. They were contemplating divorce, and were only dissuaded by the united efforts of the pastor and relatives.

Unhappy homes! How many in America! And there is only one remedy. If Christ does not sit at the head of the table all the time as the most honored guest in the house, there is danger. He is the only hope for the family life.

Lloyd George Cancels Irish Parleys at Inverness

THE Irish peace negotiations have come perilously near a complete breakdown, so near that Premier Lloyd George has cancelled the arrangements for a conference at Inverness, Scotland, with the Sinn Fein representatives. This action was taken after the receipt of a letter from Eamonn de Valera which on its face was an acceptance of the Premier's invitation, but which qualified this acceptance by the declaration that Ireland "has formally declared its independence and recognizes itself as a sovereign state. It is only as representatives of that state and as its chosen guardians that we have authority or powers to act on behalf of its people."

When Mr. Lloyd George received this letter, he warned the Irish couriers of the very serious effect of that paragraph, and gave time for Mr. de Valera to reconsider it. Mr. de Valera, however, stood firm and after the letter had been published in its original form in Dublin, the Premier sent a communication announcing the cancellation of the conference. He chided the Irish leader for not making a more generous response to the British concessions, and declared every advance had been made by the British, while "on your part you have not come to meet us by a single step, but have merely reiterated in phrases of emphatic challenge the letter and spirit of your original claims."

This was followed by telegraphic exchanges in which the Premier declared he would meet the Sinn Fein delegates only as spokesmen for the Irish people.

Each side was extremely anxious to avoid the odium of breaking off the negotiations, because of the effect of such an act on the public opinion of the world, as was made manifest by the Dail Eireann's course in naming six representatives for the Inverness conference at the same time it unanimously approved the letter which brought about the cancellation. Mr. de Valera was not to be a member of this delegation, which was headed by Arthur Griffith.

World Court Judges Named

THE League of Nations has elected the eleven members of the permanent Court of International Justice—called the "vitalizing soul of the League"—which is to be open to all countries and to which thirty nations already have subscribed. The tribunal is to occupy part of the Peace Palace at The Hague, and one of its great services is expected to be the establishment of international law in a manner which will make it possible to codify it.

The Council and the Assembly voted separately for Judges, as provided in the League Covenant, and on their first lists they agreed on nine of the eleven members. Balloting then was resumed and the final list soon was made up, each body conceding one seat. Although the United States never has ratified the world court project, one American—John Bassett Moore, lawyer, diplomatist and long prominent in international affairs—was named. The others elected were: Viscount Robert Bannatyne Finlay, of Great Britain; Charles André Weiss, France; Dionisio Anzilotti, Italy; Rafael Altamira y Cravea, Spain; Senator Ruy Barbosa, Brazil; Antonio de Bustamante, Cuba; Max Huber, Switzerland; B. C. J. Loder, Holland; Didrik G. G. Nyholm, Denmark; and Yoruzo Oda, Japan.

When acceptances have been received the judges will be asked to meet to elect their president, and it is hoped the court will be ready to function by January 1.

Agenda for Conference Submitted

EXCHANGES now are in progress among the governments which are to participate in the Washington conference on limitation of armaments regarding the subjects to be discussed at its sessions. Secretary Hughes has submitted to the other Powers and China the American suggestions of topics to be embodied in the agenda, and these form the basis of the informal conversations. No information regarding the details of the American note was given out, and it was considered probable that the official list of topics would not be revealed in advance of the opening session, owing to the difficulties in reaching a formal agreement on the agenda.

Officials in Washington emphasized the fact that America was not trying to dictate the subjects to be considered, but merely was submitting its ideas as to the subjects on which agreement is necessary in order that real progress may be made toward limitation of armaments. Well-informed observers in Washington believed the list suggested was long, including discussion of the Russian problem and many points concerning China, in addition to other Pacific and disarmament questions.

New York City's Primaries

WITH the fusion slate, composed of Republicans and independent Democrats, overwhelmingly victorious in the Republican primaries, the lines are drawn in New York City for a vigorous municipal campaign which will be watched closely throughout the country.

On the Democratic side Mayor John F. Hylan and Controller Charles L. Craig were renominated without a contest, and Murray Hulbert, now Dock Commissioner, was unopposed for President of the Board of Aldermen. For some of the minor posts there were bitter fights, and the fact that Julius Miller, former state senator, won by only 8,500 votes out of 50,000 cast over James J. Hines, a foe of Tammany Leader Charles F. Murphy, for Borough President of Manhattan was hailed by the fusionists as showing a revolt against Tammany, which promised well for fusion success. Mr. Hines charged fraud, demanded a recount and prepared to continue his battle against the Tammany leader.

Henry H. Curran, the fusion selection, polled 103,174 votes, 65,294 more than the nearest of his three opponents for the Republican mayoralty nomination. Judge Reuben E. Haskell, whose violent anti-prohibition stand had made his strength an uncertain quantity in a city considered so wet, ran third with only 29,468 votes, a showing not calculated to alarm the friends of the Eighteenth Amendment. State Senator Charles C. Lockwood for Controller, Vincent Gilroy, a Democrat, for President of the Board of Aldermen were easy victors for the other city-wide places on the Republican ticket.

NORTH DAKOTA TO VOTE ON RECALL OF GOVERNOR. The country's first election on the recall of a chief executive of a state will be held in North Dakota on October 28, petitions bearing 73,000 names having demanded a vote on the recall of Governor Lynn J. Frazier, Attorney General William Lemke and John Hagen, Commissioner of Agriculture, who comprise the commission which manages the state industries. It is a part of the fight against the Non-Partisan League.

PRESBYTERIAN COUNCIL MEETS. The eleventh council of the Alliance of Reformed Churches holding the Presbyterian System has begun a nine-day session in Pittsburgh, with more than fifty delegates from abroad in attendance. The number of constituents represented by the 500 delegates was placed at 40,000,000.

WORLD METHODISTS FOR PROHIBITION. A resolution urging Methodists everywhere to wage relentless warfare on the liquor traffic was adopted by the World Conference of Methodists in London, and other resolutions called for international disarmament and the complete abolition of war. An address for circulation all over the world summoned the Methodists to "aggressive militant Christianity."

BODIES OF ZR-2 VICTIMS ARRIVE. The bodies of the fifteen Americans who perished in the disaster to the dirigible ZR-2 at Hull, England, have been returned to America aboard the British cruiser Dauntless. Services were held in New York and every honor paid to the dead.

RAILROAD PASSENGER REVENUES INCREASE. Passenger fares paid to 168 railroads showed an increase of $8,667,969 for the first six months of this year as compared with the same period in 1920, despite the fact that there was a decrease of 73,576,000 in the number of fares, according to Interstate Commerce statistics. The average rate was 3.133 cents a mile this year as against 2.603 in 1920.

AMERICANS BUY SHARE IN HAPSBURG ESTATE. Prominent American capitalists have purchased an interest in the estate of Archduke Frederick of Austria and his family and it is to be operated by a corporation in which the Hapsburgs hold two-thirds and the Americans one-third of the stock. The estate includes 1,200,000 acres of land in five countries in addition to huge industrial plants, and its total value runs into the hundreds of millions of dollars. A fight will be waged before the League of Nations to recover part of the property which has been confiscated.

RAILROAD STRIKE THREATENED. Railroad Shopmen belonging to the six federated shop unions have voted to strike against the general wage cut of July 1, according to an announcement by B. M. Jewell, their chief, but will defer action until after the taking of a vote on acceptance or rejection of the working rules now being drafted by the Federal Railway Labor Board. He predicted that other railroad unions, including the Big Four Brotherhoods, would cooperate if a strike is ordered.

GREEKS RETIRE BEHIND THE SAKARIA. A Greek official statement has admitted the abandonment of the pursuit of the Turkish Nationalists in the drive toward Angora and the retirement of the Greek forces behind the Sakaria river. Venizelists declared the Hellenic offensive had definitely failed and predicted an early collapse of King Constantine's power at the Asia Minor front and in Greece.

PICTURESQUE INVERNESS LOOMS LARGE IN BRITISH AFFAIRS THESE DAYS.

This Scottish town is something of a vacation capital for the Empire now, for it was in the famous castle at the left that Premier Lloyd George wished to meet the Irish representatives to discuss peace terms, and it is there the British cabinet has been summoned to decide its reply to the Sinn Fein demands

Reflectors of God

TEXT—Gen. 33 : 10. "I have seen thy face as though I had seen the face of God."

WHEN the storm-cloud in his brother's heart broke up into smiles, the fugitive knew that the storm-cloud in God's heart was transmitted into smiles. He inferred the one from the other. By our conduct we are influencing the shape of men's thoughts about God. Jacob judged the disposition of God by what he found in Esau. If Esau had met Jacob differently; if, instead of forgiveness, he had met him with hatred, and instead of tears he had met him with frowns, how do you think Jacob might have regarded God? If a man is hungering for forgiveness on earth and forgiveness in heaven, and finds that forgiveness on earth is denied, might he not take the denial as a sign that for him there is no forgiveness in heaven, that he has to deal with an unfriendly and relentless God? It is hard for any man to believe in the forgiveness of God when he finds no forgiveness among men.

The one proof of the forgiveness of God, for which many souls are waiting, is to find forgiveness among God's children. Unforgiveness on earth clouds the sky of many a man's heaven. Souls that are conscious of great needs are prone to form their thoughts of God from the dispositions which they find in us. Well, how do we represent God?

Suppose that the prodigal, in our Lord's parable, when he was returning home with a soul pining for forgiveness and love, had first of all met with the elder brother. Suppose he had looked into that elder brother's face to find there some hint as to the reception he would meet with from his father, is it not very probable that he would have gone back again into degradation, and have regarded his father as his foe? The face of the elder brother would have given a cruel misrepresentation of his father's face. And yet, like Jacob with Esau, men often take their conception of the Father's face from the face of His sons, and for the representation we give we shall be held responsible.

It is one of the fundamental beliefs in the Christian life that our Lord lives in His redeemed and sanctified children. A Christian man is a man whose life is inhabited by Christ. A Christian woman is a woman whose life is inhabited by Christ. We are only the houses. Christ is the Guest. Christ looks through us, speaks through us, works through us. We live, yet not we, Christ liveth in us. If that is not Christianity, what is it? Christianity means that Christ comes into human life, lays hold of these avenues of sense, employs them as the channels of grace, uses our eyes, our hands, our voices, all our features and powers, to reveal Himself to others. That's our creed, the Biblical creed, the same yesterday, to-day, forever. A Christian is a man who seeks to show the world the likeness of Christ. A perfect Christian would be a man or woman on whom the needy would gaze and say: "I have seen thy face as though I had seen the face of God."

NOW, if that be the profession which we make to the world, that as Christians we are endeavoring to show forth the likeness of Christ, how infinitely important it is that we should not misrepresent Him, that when any needy soul lifts his eyes upon us, he may truly see in us the disposition of his God. There are three great presences in the world, which as Christians we have to face. We have to face sin; we have to face infirmity; and we have to face penitence. Now, the world wants to know what Christ thinks and feels about these; how He is disposed towards sin, how He is disposed towards infirmity, and how He is disposed towards repentance. An how does the world find it out? Very often by looking into the face of Christ's children, and reading there the mind and heart of Christ. Jacob looked into Esau's face, and from that inferred the face of God. And the world looks into our faces to see how our Master views sin and infirmity and repentance; and we are to see to it that before each of them men are to see in our face the face of Christ.

Well, now, every day we have to stand in the presence of sin and face it. When men, who are engaged in sin, dealing in uncleanness, look up at us, they are to see the very face of Christ. What kind of a face had Christ in the presence of sin? He had a face of hostility and intense indignation. What is indignation? Indignation is the recoil of offended dignity, it is the anger of injured love. Where there is most love there can be most indignation. Where there is no love, indignation cannot exist. Passion can exist where there is no love, and so can bad temper, but we must always distinguish between indignation and revenge. Indignation is a fire that burns to refine. Revenge is a fire that burns to destroy. Indignation is fed by love; nay, it is love. Revenge is fed by selfishness; nay, it is selfishness. Where you can have much selfishness, you can have much revenge. Where you have much love, you can have much indignation. A life that has little love never warms to righteous anger. Where love in a man's heart is only like twilight, you can't get much fire. But where love fills a man's heart as light fills the noontide, then you have material for a fire. Fire is focussed light. Indignation is focussed love, it is love burning.

Look at Christ in the little home at Bethany to which He has retired from the bustling city to spend a quiet evening with His bosom friends. His love falls upon the little family group like soft, cheery sunlight. But look at Him when He stands in the presence of bad men, who "devour widows' houses," and make unjust gain of the fatherless, and who cover up their wickedness with the thin pretence of prayer, and then His love does not beam in soft sunlight; it is focussed in fiery indignation. It blazes forth in words of condemnation that fall upon men's hearts like burning lead.

Look at Paul, when he meets with those few praying where it ought to express dissent. We laugh at coarse jests. We smile at men's descriptions of their own dirty ways. And the coarse jester and the trickster look at our faces, and, finding there these slight hints of approval, are encouraged to go deeper in their lax and vulgar life. By an indifferent, or an approving face, we make men think more lightly of sin, and to make men think more lightly of sin is to make them think more lightly of God. We want the face of Jesus in the presence of sin. We want the face of honest indignation set against all of public sinfulness and public indecency and perversity which could be shamed away by the absolute withdrawal of Christian applause.

There is a great deal of public vulgarity which could be burned away by the fire of Christian indignation. We could all help to purify humanity if we ceased to give the devil the aid of our smiles. Don't let us countenance sin; that is, don't let us give it our countenance, our face; let us face it with disapproval. Let us show the world that sin offends our manhood and womanhood, and finds in our Christian love a hostile force. Let sinful men see in us what they will eternally find in God, a determined and unceasing repugnance to all sin, so that when they look into your face and mine, they may in very truth see in it the face of God.

BUT there is another presence we have to face. We have to face infirmity—all manner of impotent folk, crushed under many burdens, stricken with much grief. Now, infirmity wants to know how Christ thinks and feels about it, and it looks up into the Christian face to find hints about the mind and heart of Christ. Now, how shall we truly represent Him? How did Christ's face reveal Him in the presence of infirmities? Shall I read you one or two verses which are quite familiar to us all? "There cometh to Him a leper . . . and Jesus was moved with compassion, and touched him." "Two blind men sat by the wayside; Jesus was moved with compassion." "Now, when He drew near to the gate of the city, behold there was carried out one that was dead, the only son of his mother, and she was a widow. And when the Lord saw her, he had compassion on her." All the compassion in that big heart of His looked out of His face when He stood in the presence of infirmity and grief. The Apostle James had seen a great deal of the Masters' face, and he sums up the description of all that he had seen in these simply beautiful words, "The Lord is very pitiful."

The Christ's face, in the presence of the world's burdens and griefs, was lighted up with wondrous pity and compassion, and we are to represent that face in the world today. These aching, weary, heavy-laden lives are wondering what heaven is thinking about them, and they are trying to satisfy their wonder by looking at the Christian face. And sometimes they find Christian faces emptied of pity, and they come to think heaven is emptied of love. So Christ is misrepresented by His own. Our danger is this—we become accustomed to the sight of infirmity and sorrow. It is just a familiar part of our surroundings. The passing funeral train awakens no more, or little more, thought than the passing of the tram-car. The blind man becomes as unnoticed as the curbstone. Sorrow and burdens become so familiar as to cease to break the spell of our thought. Familiarity lures us into indifference, and indifference turns the face into an awful blank. Then the crushed life looks up into the blank face, and painfully wonders if God's face is blank, too.

It is the privilege of good men and women to make it easier for the weary and the heavy-laden to believe in the compassion of a good God. It is the privilege of a Christian to make it easier for the widow and the orphan to believe in the love of Christ. If my face is full of pity, they will dare to hope in the compassion of my Christ. But it is hard work to look beyond all the indifference and all the blank faces of your Christian fellow-men, and believe in the pitifulness of the Christ. It is easier for men at midnight to believe in the existence of the great sun when they can see the moon riding in the heavens, and shining with light reflected from the unseen orb. And it is easier for men and women, whose souls have to pass through darkness, to believe in the compassion of the Sun of Righteousness, when they see reflections of the light, and experience the compassion of God's children.

Let our light so shine before men, that they shall glorify our Father, in heaven. Let our pitifulness be to them an assurance of the pitifulness of God, that when they look at our face they may exclaim with joy, "I have seen thy face, as though I had seen the face of God."

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"My Days Are Gliding Swiftly By," or "My Faith Looks Up to Thee."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—I John 3 : 13-24. The Love of God in Our Hearts.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation—(See page 711, first column.)

Sermon—"REFLECTORS OF GOD"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—These may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," or "From Every Stormy Wind that Blows."

Benediction—By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

Our Father: In all confidence in Thy mercy and Thy constant love, may we now depart with the blessing of the message to cheer us so much that we can have enough to spare for others. We ask in Jesus' name. AMEN.

souls under the blue heaven of the riverside to pray. His love breathes out a gracious influence, soft and genial as the warm air of a summer's morn. But see him when he stands in the presence of dissimulation, hypocrisy and injustice, and the quiet sunlight of his love changes into burning indignation, and flashes forth in condemnation. For sin, love has nothing but burnings, everlasting burnings! As long as sin exists, there must be a furnace of fire, call it by whatever name you please. The love that is the light of heaven is also the fire of hell. Before sin, God's face is one of indignation, of burning love. "The face of the Lord is against them that do evil."

NOW, how is it with us? Do we represent or misrepresent that face of God in the presence of sin? When sinful men look at us—at our faces—do they see a true representation of the face of God? I am not wishing to suggest that wherever we see the presence of sin, we should loudly shout our condemnation. I do not mean to say that when we see the crooked ways of the world, we should immediately lash ourselves into frenzied expressions of disapproval. But I do mean to say that, in the presence of sin, a Christian man will show no signs of approval, or he woefully misrepresents the face of God. There is nothing which so feeds a bad man in his badness as Christian applause. There is nothing which so encourages sinful ways as to discover symptoms of approval on a Christian face.

And isn't that the danger to which as Christian men we are exposed? For purposes of expediency we temporize and compromise. We beam sunlight when we ought to flash fire. Our face expresses applause

Victory Unto Victory

SUNDAY. Rom. 1:17. "From faith to faith." Psa. 84:7. "From strength to strength." II. Cor. 3:18. "From glory to glory." I cannot claim any credit for this most suggestive association of scattered words gathered from different parts of the Word of God. They come to me as a very vivid remembrance of my boyhood. They form the text of a sermon preached in the Chapel at Halifax by the Rev. Joshua C. Harrison. I do not remember anything he said about his text, if indeed I was ever able to understand it; but I readily recall the Gladstone-like presence and countenance of the preacher, and can hear the recurring refrain of his wonderful text. Again and again it came, like a strain of most exquisite music, and one felt he was listening to glad tidings of great joy.

And who does not feel that these gathered sentences are not like a company of aliens, picked up promiscuously in many lands, but rather kindred presences which rush into each other's arms like very intimate friends. They meet and mix in blessedly co-operative union. And they are set in divinely appointed order, and the beginning is found in faith. I do not say that faith is the first thing; there are waiting presences even before faith is born. The vitalizing air is breathing around my home before I open the window to let it in. Grace is wooing before faith is awake. God is at my door long before I lift the latch. All my necessities are known and numbered long before they begin to cry. I never anticipate the grace of God; it is always there before me. I brings its abounding riches right up to my gate, and it begins to reveal them in infinite patience and forbearance, with which it awaits my sluggish and rebellious will. Yes, God is waiting. For grace is not a friendly letter from the King; it is the King Himself at the door of the house of our shame, trying the latch, seeking an entry into our dark and troubled abode, in order that He might transform the poor Cinderella of our fallen humanity into a royal princess, robed in regal and radiant attire. God is waiting, faith lets Him in. And as we open one room after another in the many-storied house of our life, as we pass from faith to faith, giving Him ever deeper and deeper entry into all our interests and affairs, God fills up our emptinesses as they are presented to Him, and our life becomes light in the Lord.

And thus the inspiration of the first word carries us to the music of the second. God's grace fructifies in our strength. How could it be otherwise? In His Presence is our native air, in Him we live, and move, and have our being. In God the soul discovers her own climate, she finds herself at home.

A friend of mine has a little tuft of edelweiss growing in his English garden, but you would never dream it is a kinsman of the luscious plant that thrives on Alpine heights. I have a bit of white heather growing in my garden, but you would smile to think it claims rank and fellowship with the magnificent roots which lift their blooms on Scottish moors. No, these things are aliens, they are exotics, they seem to pine for their native air. "So pants my soul after thee, O God!" But when God and the soul are in vital communion, the faculties of the soul put on strength and beauty. Spiritual discernments clothe themselves in power. The imagination is a new creation. The affections become a very vigorous company. And the will is like a tree planted by rivers of water. All our faculties are in congenial surroundings and they grow from strength to strength.

And if we pass from faith to faith and from strength to strength, we shall most certainly pass from glory to glory. For what is glory but the manifestation in God's children of the character of their Father? "We shall be like Him"; that is glory. It is the emergence in a human face of the lineaments of God. It is the re-incarnation of the Divine. Men see again in their fellow men the Heavenly glory, faith of grace, and truth. Compared with this, every other form of glory is only as a flare of fireworks in contrast with the quiet radiance of the stars. Earthly glories are corruptible crowns; this is incorruptible, and it fades not away. And as the holy and gracious Lord takes fuller and fuller possession of our lives, and as our faculties clothe themselves in health and strength, we become more and more plastic to the divine seal, and we bear His image and superscription. We know God, and in this realm knowledge is likeness, and likeness is glory. J. H. J.

The Still, Small Voice

MONDAY. Gen. 3:8. "And they heard the voice of the Lord God, walking in the garden in the cool of the day." Creation appeared very good to the infinite Creator; man, made only a little lower than the angels, is to be visited, loved and cherished by the fatherhood of God. He comes in the cool of the evening, after the burden of heat and toil are passed. He visits for the purpose of communion and fellowship with His child, to give help, comfort and peace. If we are hidden away, ashamed for our sins, He calls, "Where art thou? Come and rest under the shadow of My wings. Be still and know that I am God."

Have our wanderings made us afraid the Father would call, asking for a loving interview about our loss and need, and have we not said after the visit, "I had fainted unless I had believed to see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living?"

Yes, the unbearable burdens of the day are relieved by the evening and morning when the Rest-giver calls and earth's vain shadows flee. Is not the heavenly Visitor saying to you, "Let Me come in and sup with thee and thee with Me?" He comes when the curtains of the night and sorrow drop about us; He is our day, new every morning, beautiful every evening, wiping away tears, revealing vistas of bliss beyond.

Jesus of Nazareth is passing by, knocking at your door. Are you hiding amid the rubbish of sin, afraid to admit the Christ? Let Him in. He will cleanse and refurnish the soul-home. Don't say, "Go Thy way for this time; when I have reformed I will send for Thee." While the still, small Voice is speaking in the garden of the soul, let us respond, "Here am I, Lord; what wilt Thou have me to do?" He will tell you, send you out, cool your brow with His hand of love. His balm of Gilead will heal your hurt; His arms will hold you safe till you are removed to His nearer Presence, His upper Paradise. E. W. C.

Righteousness Shall Triumph

TUESDAY. Rev. 6:2. "And I saw, and behold a white horse and he that sat on him had a bow, and a crown was given unto him; and he went forth conquering and to conquer." The book of wisdom is not closed. The limit of Christian experience has not yet been reached. The vision of God has not all been caught by human eyes. The glory of the Church is not her history of the past but her history of the future. The Spirit of Jesus is in our midst, patiently waiting to lead devout hearts into the ripper and fuller experiences of Christian thought and action, in fields not yet touched. Much as man has thought and said and planned and done, he is but on the threshold of mightier manifestations of the Holy Spirit. The world is growing better because humanity is growing nobler. It cannot be otherwise. That is the Christian's faith, and that is the promise of the book of Revelation upon which all healthy faith must rest.

Much that is difficult to understand in the Book of Revelation is prone to confuse us. This too shall be explained. The world is yet in its infancy. The philosophers are still studying their first reader. This we do know and this we can understand: "Jesus Christ shall come forth conquering and to conquer." It was intended from the beginning of creation that the Kingdom of God should be established in the heart of humanity. It was so intended and God cannot be defeated. Two men stood in the Coliseum at Rome. "Think of the men who have stood here," said one. "Think of the men who will stand here," answered the other. That is the Christian outlook in all ages. It is the forward look of faith that faces the dawn. R. B.

God's Hatred of Shams

WEDNESDAY. James 3:17. "The wisdom that is from above is pure . . . without variance, without hypocrisy." If there is anything in this world that God hates, it is sham. Christ never grew indignant, according to the Gospels, except when in the presence of the Scribes and Pharisees. Their outstanding sin was hypocrisy. More than any other this sin aroused His anger. It was because His sense of what was right and true was opposed to all superficial things, and He cried out against the false.

One of the great problems of the day is to face the shams of our social life, to keep up appearances and not lose face. There are shams in education, shams in business, need of pure food laws, proper labels upon medicine. We are seeing terrific efforts to break down even constitutional amendments in order that men may secure drugs and alcoholic beverages. Men strive in the political world to gain something for nothing, and elections are often wrongfully contested.

But most of all and worst of all, in the religious life, to live an evil life and eulogize spiritual things to the sky, to hope that heaven may be won and yet give as little as possible, or grind down others. Many live ostentatious lives, and are meagre and niggardly in their gifts for God's work.

God is calling for men to heed the deeper things of life, to know that the judgment will fall, and His wrath rests upon all sham, no matter what one's position or the realm of life in which this is true. H. H.

The Personality of Jesus

THURSDAY. John 11:8. "Show us the Father and it sufficeth us." Personality is a strange thing, an impenetrable mystery. Indeed, it is the greatest mystery of the universe, for it involves the very nature of God Himself. What is this quality in some personalities which radiates influence? We call them magnetic. Perhaps it were better to call them radioactive. It is one of the gifts of a great leader. If you have ever been in a room into which Theodore Roosevelt entered, you have been aware of the entrance of a new force into the mass—his personality pervaded the room. Where he sat became the head of the table. Other leaders have had such a personality. John Wesley was such an one. So was Martin Luther. So have been others in history.

About eighteen hundred and ninety years ago, there lived a Man whose Personality, cast across the darkness of that age, brightens it as lightning does a mid-night sky. He lived—there is no doubt of that. He died—there is no doubt of that. Nor is there doubt as to how He died. Then, singularly, when the world thought it had got rid of Him, His Personality continued all the more powerfully to impress men. The brightest pages of all the centuries since are those across which His Personality most freely moves, those He dominates most fully, those He most fills with the influence of Himself.

Who was this Man? Or rather, who is He, for His Personality is abroad in our age. We have not time to review much which might be said in answer to this question, but we have time to confront the words He Himself spoke to Philip who wanted "to get to God": "Have I been so long time with thee and yet hast thou not known Me?" The full implication of these words we can not miss. C. C. A.

In the Place of Others

FRIDAY. Ezek. 3:15. "I sat where they sat." These are the words of the prophet Ezekiel. The occasion was when he journeyed to the valley of the Euphrates where his brethren were in exile. He states that he set out "in bitterness and in the heat of my spirit." When he saw the real conditions under which his brethren were living, coming to the place with much to say, he said very little. He says: "I sat where they sat . . . astonished among them for seven days." Here we have meditation before action. For seven days the prophet allowed the details of the situation to sink into his understanding. Put yourself into the other person's place. Think before you act.

Paul puts the matter thus: "Remember them that are in bonds as though bound with them." To be able to do this will go a long way toward the removal of injustice and mistakes.

In this, as in all things, Jesus is our example. He saw possibilities, potentialities, potencies in the raw material of humble fishermen, tax-gatherers and sinners, and by the alchemy of His love, changed these into the rock-like qualities and foundation stones upon which he constructed his Church. Jesus saw the glory in the commonplace. Beginning now, let us endeavor, as far as our limited conceptions and human abilities allow, to see the world as Jesus saw it. Not closing our eyes to sin, yet seeing the good in everybody and building on that. In the last analysis, the function of Christian preaching and teaching is not telling the world how bad it is, but how good it may become. R. B.

The Simple-Hearted and the Doubter

SATURDAY. John 1:50. "Thou shalt see greater things than these." Nathanael was easily convinced. He had expressed some doubt about anything good coming from Nazareth, yet by accepting Philip's invitation, he no sooner comes into the presence of Jesus than he surrenders completely in an eager and ardent confession of faith. Jesus apparently noted the ease with which this new disciple was made, and there is at least the hint that the Master would have preferred that he had been slower in making up his mind. Manifestly he was without guile, as Jesus described him.

Nathanael is a type of those hearts that receive Christ upon introduction and slight subsequent acquaintance. They do not demand the "greater things," because they are more than satisfied with the first tokens: They come, they see, and straightway they accept Him. But Jesus is prepared to reach those hearts that more stubbornly resist. The Gospel is not only for the credulous and the easily persuaded. Christ is always offering a superabundance of evidence. He stands ready to give, not the minimum, but the maximum of proof. After He has satisfied simple-hearted Nathanael, he proceeds to meet the requirements of doubting Thomas. W. L. G.

THIRTY-TWO pages of the preceding issue of the Christian Herald were devoted to an account of the administration of the Christian Herald's fund for China Famine Relief and to the names of contributors in the states from Alabama up to Oregon in alphabetical order. In this issue we continue the publication of the list of contributions. In the entire list there are 37,772 names and the average contributed is $15.02—the most generous response in the history of the many notable relief enterprises undertaken by this magazine.

his survivor. He chooses three out of the whole number. Their names are thrown into a golden casket, provided for that purpose by a former Emperor of China. The abbots of the great monasteries then assemble, and after a week of prayer the lots are drawn in their presence and in the presence of the surviving Great Lama, and the Chinese political resident, who always lives in Lahasa. The child whose name is first drawn is the future Great Lama. Each of the other two receives five hundred pieces of silver.

Next to these high officials come the abbots of the smaller monasteries, of which there are thousands in Thibet. They are also incarnations, and there are very few monasteries either in Thibet or in Mongolia who do not claim to possess one of these living Buddhas.

Besides these mystical persons there are, in the church of Thibet, many ranks of degree corresponding to deacon, priest, dean and doctor and the rest.

THE City of Lahasa, long known as the Forbidden City, is still very much of a mystery. It is about twelve thousand feet above sea level and stands upon a plain surrounded by high hills. The city is circular in form, perhaps a mile in diameter. The streets are fairly straight, but without paving or any drainage system. While the houses of the richer people are built of stone and brick and are fairly respectable, the inferior quarters of the city are unspeakably filthy. The city contains, in addition to many temples and build-

Young People's Topic for October 9

By REV. RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN

How to Improve the Meetings of Our Society

B. Y. P. U., C. E. and E. L.

THE topic is a challenge to our organizing ability and our genius for intelligent leadership. The summer months are gone and the crisp fall days are here. The rest-time is over and the work-time has begun. Nothing worth while is ever done without a plan. No efficient work is ever accomplished without a definite program.

There are three things we may do. The first is prayer. We find a promise in the scripture reference given with the topic, in Matt. 18:17-18. "Verily I say unto you, Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth, shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth, shall be loosed in heaven." "Again, I say unto you, that if two of you shall agree on earth as touching anything that they shall ask, it shall be done for them of ings connected with the monasteries and convents, the great temple called "Jokhang," which is regarded as the center of all Thibet from which all the main roads are supposed to radiate. This contains, in addition to many ancient shrines and much carving and ornamentation, the throne of the Grand Lama and the seat of the administration of his government.

The famous Portola Hill, covered by the palaces of the Dalai Lama, forms a very majestic mountain of buildings, and is, externally, at any rate, one of the most remarkable and impressive pieces of construction in the world. No one from the outside world has ever explored all of its thousands of interior apartments and halls.

In the immediate vicinity of Lahasa there are three great monasteries, each containing thousands of monks, one of them, Debung, being probably the largest monastery in the world, having some eight thousand monks resident within its walls.

The temples in these monasteries are some of them very ornate and are decorated in a most lavish fashion with gold and precious stones.

When the touch of modern life will come to the "Snow Land" or when the arts of modern civilization will reach up to this "roof of the world" is something that only the event can show. It is still shrouded in clouds, the home of superstition, ignorance, autocracy and a weary moulthing of the syllables of a once simple philosophy, that has lost its meaning under the accumulating burden on an empty formalism and a blind credulity.

my Father which is in heaven." After having agreed on a plan of action, "take it to the Lord in prayer" for approval and blessing. The second thing to do is to read. Read up on methods. Send to your publishing house for literature on denominational aims and polity of procedure. Paul said to Timothy "Give attention to reading." It is sound advice. The Christian has his literature as well as the tradesman his "journal" or the professional man his "Review." The third thing to do is to be original. Break traditional molds. Because something has been done one hundred times is no reason why it should be done the one hundred and first time. Be a trail-blazer and a path-finder. Leadership depends on daring, originality, initiative. It has always been so in every walk of life. It is true in the realm of present-day religious thought and endeavor. Avoid the rut. Shun repetition. In this way you make your meetings attractive.

and made to feel low and small any more than they do now. Particularly church people."

"I fancy the word 'condescend' had a different meaning then than now, or perhaps the translation is unfortunate," Mrs. Haile rallied to say. "Leaving the question of parish-visiting, do I understand you to decline my proposition to order light refreshments to be sent to your class two or three times a month, and to visit your rooms now and then to become personally acquainted with the girls? I do not wish to be officious. But they are under my husband's pastoral care, and I hoped to be of some service to them."

"I wish I could make my meaning clear to you, my dear lady! These girls and the families to which they belong do not expect to be on visiting terms with the pastor's wife or with her social associates. The church suppers and sociables and all that sort of entertainment are arranged with express reference to them and their kind. They meet you there upon their own ground, as it were."

"Then, if it will not be too much trouble to you both, we will leave the question of my visits to your rooms and refreshments to a committee of two—the President of the League and the commissioned Parish Visitor." Mrs. Haile forced herself to smile and speak civilly in articulating the sentence. "I thank you and Mrs. Wingate for taking the matter into serious consideration."

"It would have been polite to offer her a cup of afternoon tea," ruminated the baited woman in sipping the cup of which her racked nerves had sore need. "Yet"—her sense of humor coming to her help for one grim instant—"she might have felt obliged to telephone to the President of the Woman's League for Christian Unity for permission to drink it."

She was dressed for dinner—and rather more carefully than was her wont, for her mirror showed lines in the face which were not there that morning—when her husband returned. The kiss with which he saluted her was achieved over a brown paper parcel held daintily between his hands, and before putting it down he led the way to the fernery.

"See what I found just as I was ready to come home!" he said, setting his burden upon a table and unwrapping it tenderly to reveal two pots of cyclamen, one bearing a single pink blossom, the other, a white, and both affluent in buds. "The first I have seen this season!" lifting one upon his palm. "I espied them in a florist's window and, recollecting how you love them, marched in and bought the pair. 'Will they bloom in a Wardian case under glass?' I asked as the fellow tied them into a portable parcel. He answered promptly, 'No!' and when I dared to dissent, declared it 'impossible.' As you may have suspected upon previous occasions that hateful word 'impossible' is the crack of a whip in my ear, urging me to do the thing out of hand. So, I brought home the beauties, with all the love they can express to the dearest of created women."

"As I happen to know that the cyclamen will bloom under glass, you are sure of a reward for your resolution. They should be in full bloom by Easter."

She had her trowel in hand and was excavating a resting-place at one end of the miniature garden for the pink beauty, talking all the time in joyousness that smoothed out the lines in the face her husband still thought lovely. Before he could offer to assist her, both plants were snugly ensconced in their respective ends of the fernery.

"Now," said he, "if you will sit down for a few minutes, I will tell you of a little 'happening' of today that will please you."

He related the incident Mrs. Wingate had brought to his notice, telling it simply, without a dash of the picturesque that had charmed him when it passed another's lips. But Anita's eyes were brimming.

"Aftermath!" was her verbal comment. He nodded a glad assent.

She kept to her discreet and true wifely self all that pertained to Miss Maynard's visit. She would not mix briars and thorns with the pure joy of the Aftermath.

CHAPTER XI

PINK and white cyclamen justified Stuart's defiance of the "impossible" by taking kindly to their new environment. When Mrs. Haile raised the lid of the fernery upon Easter morning, she uttered a cry of ecstasy that brought husband and children to her side. Each bud was a-bloom and seemed to vibrate with the joy of living.

"The darlings know what day it is and what is expected of them!" ejaculated the owner almost reverently. "They have given us the keynote for the season."

She recollected the fancy for many a month and the opus to which it was the prelude. The weather was glorious, with never a touch of the chill humidity that too often makes the atmospheric condition of "an Easter day" anything but "a glad sight." Mrs. Haile's tenacious memory brought the lines to her lips as she entered the church door and glanced over her shoulder at the sun-bathed world outside.

The Committee on Decoration appointed by the League had outdone themselves in the selection and arrangement of the wealth of floral adornments upon this the first Easter the new pastor was to spend with them. The newspapers Monday morning would advertise the gratifying fact that in no other metropolitan temple had such sums been expended in the celebration of the Eastertide. The walls were corniced and draped with wreaths in which lilies bore the prominent place, and the sacred desk was showered with the same symbolic flower. The music was likewise the best the city could boast, the choir-proper being reinforced by professional talent of the finest order—and the highest prices. The congregation of well-dressed men and sumptuously attired women filled the spacious edifice to the doors.

Under such auspicious circumstances did Stuart Haile, pastor, preach that Easter forenoon on "The First Easter Sermon."

Silas Ford, capitalist, who had, as he was rather proud to confess "an eye for the picturesque," had pursed his lips and shaken his head over the caption when he read it in the morning newspaper. It was the reverse of sensational and churchgoers must have sensations or they would cease to frequent the sanctuary. He told his wife that he had faith in Haile to believe that he "could turn out something original," but he "wished he had selected some other title."

THE Bible reading preceding the anthem that came before the sermon was the portion of the twenty-fourth chapter of St. Luke that records the Walk of Emmaus, on the afternoon of the Resurrection Sabbath. The text was taken from the same chapter: "And Jesus himself drew near and walked with them."

With skill that would have won him fame as an impressionist artist had he been a painter, the speaker sketched the leading features of the earlier part of the Greatest Day the earth has ever known. The risen tomb; the terrified Roman guard; the meeting with Mary Magdalene and the magic of that one word "Mary!" that revealed the Risen Lord; the swift-footed John outrunning the hitherto impetuous Peter, lagging perhaps under the weight of the remembered Denial; the hurrying to and fro of women who believed, yet could not convince judicial men—these things were dashed upon the canvas, and then the Master, Who was dead and was alive again, disappeared from the sight of the seeking disciples. Had He then fulfilled the prophecy of His Ascension into Heaven as He had verified the prediction of His victory over the grave? Not one salient feature was overlooked in the summary that brought the Story to the imagination as if it were a thing of yesterday.

Then the minister sketched the lonely country road, between seven and eight miles long, that led from Jerusalem to the obscure village of Emmaus as it may have looked to the two weary-hearted Galilean peasants who left the city gates to stroll listlessly along the dusty highway a little after the noon of that first Easter day. There was nothing left for them to do or learn there. Hope had died out of their hearts. It was worse than useless to go over the ground they had been traversing all day. Yet they could not let the subject go from heart and tongue. So earnest was the fruitless discussion that it attracted the attention of another wayfarer who accosted them kindly.

"What manner of communications are these that you have with one another and are sad?"

It was so evident that sincere interest in the cause of the discussion and not idle curiosity prompted the query that they soon found themselves pouring out the whole story. One of the disciples was Cleopas, and he spoke with carelessness that was akin to contempt of certain women who had brought a tale of seeing angels who affirmed that He Whom we trusted would have redeemed Israel was not dead but alive. Such an improbable tale that it was hardly worth repeating.

THEN and there, under the sunset sky, upon the lonely country road was the First Easter Sermon preached.

"And what a scope the speaker had. From Eden to Calvary all the things that were written in the Scriptures of the Christ were made manifest to the listeners. By the time the roofs of the humble village to which they were bound appeared upon the horizon—dimly seen in the twilight of the day that was far spent, those two peasants—unlearned working-men—knew more of what we call in our age the 'Messianic prophecies' and their fulfillment than all the Doctors of Divinity who have ever lived and written will ever know until they get to Heaven.

"We could wish perhaps, at the first blush, that the name of the second auditor had come down to us. Yet upon second thoughts perhaps we see that withholding it was one of the 'Deep things of God.'

"Have you ever thought of where and with whom Our Lord, Who should likewise be our Exemplar in all things, sat down to break bread on the evening of the Resurrection Day? So far as we know it was for the first time since the angels had rolled away the stone from the door of the sepulchre sealed 'and made sure' by Pilate. Not as we might naturally expect, with loyal Nicodemus, the converted ruler and master in Israel; nor yet with rich Joseph of Arimathea, whose influence with the Roman Governor had secured for him the high privilege of laying the slain body of the Lamb of God in his own family vault. The table was set in what was probably a mean village inn and His companions were two peasants so obscure in parentage and in history that the name of one is not known to the Church should she desire to canonize him.

"Just so surely as

'Earth's saddest day and Earth's gladdest day
Were but one day apart,'—

the Jesus Who 'drew near and went with them' along that stretch of country road—"Jesus Christ the same yesterday and today and forever"—still draws near to the sorrowing and the doubting, the bewildered and straying disciple, despised and rejected by the proud and prosperous, and walks with him until the goal of life is reached."

Such was, in effect, the message brought by the undershepherd from the Master to his flock that Easter at high noon of the First Day of the Week forever consecrated by the triumph of the Lord of Life over death and hell.

I have not presumed to give more than a vague outline of that Message. It was replete with apt and beautiful illustrations and abounded in passages of true eloquence. The quiet dispersion of the large congregation after the benediction was a token of the reverence inspired by the service.

STUART HAILE followed his wife into her sitting-room when luncheon was over.

"Miss Maynard waited in the vestry to speak to me," he said hurriedly. "Mrs. Davis, the consumptive whom you visited last week, is very near the end of her tedious journey. She is very anxious to partake once more of the Lord's Supper. Her son, James Davis, was one of those who were admitted to the membership of the church this morning—you may have recognized his name!"

"Indeed I did and thanked God for it," she replied. "She talked to me of her children when I was there. Her daughter is already a church member and one of Miss Maynard's 'girls.' You will let me go with you—will you not?"

"I hoped that you would. Mr. Ford was also in the vestry. The daughter is employed in his store in some capacity, and the son is one of his porters. Silas has a good heart under the golden-plated casing. He and another of the elders will be there. Anticipating that you would like to be with us, I intimated as much to him. He will take us in his car at the conclusion of the afternoon service."

"I am glad I sent the mother some Easter flowers last evening!" the wife ruminated audibly as her husband left her for his study. "Perhaps the impulse to do it was a premonition of what is to be done there today. I am more and more inclined to believe in such 'leadings' as I grow older."

The Easter celebration of the Communion of the Lord's Supper in the Church was the second service of the day. There was no sermon and the sun was not near the setting when Silas Ford's limousine set down the pastor and his wife and the two elders before a tall tenement house in a side street a mile distant from the church.

A climb of three flights of stairs brought the party to the door of the Davis "apartment." The largest of four rooms, intended by the builder as a parlor, was the bed-chamber of the invalid. A single bed draped with white stood in a far corner. The sick woman, fully dressed and wrapped in a white shawl, was propped into an upright position by pillows. Her gray hair was becomingly arranged by loving hands above the worn face that yet bore signs of comeliness. She held out both her wasted hands at sight of Mrs. Haile, the sunken eyes bright with delight.

"Mary said she was almost sure you would come!" she quavered. "But I hardly dared hope for it."

A motion of the head and an expressive smile directed the visitor's eyes to the vase of Easter lilies upon a stand at her side.

"They have kept me from feeling lonely all day. And I have so much besides to be thankful for!" was spoken in the lady's ear.

"I might almost have believed myself back in Marlinton!" Anita told her husband that evening.

She would not let herself dwell upon the thought while she was amid the scenes that awakened the memory. Sitting down by the mother, she took her hand and stroked it while she murmured brief congratulations. The son, a strapping youth of twenty-one, leaned over the back of his mother's chair as Mr. Haile addressed him.

"I am trying to tell her how glad I am for what you have done today," was said so clearly he did not lose a word, yet in subdued accents that reached none of the four who were arranging the preliminaries of the little service. "I know what it meant to her, for I have a boy of my own who will take the same step when he is a little older."

STUART was too well-versed in the pastor's office to the sick to prolong what had to be said and done. A solemn hush fell upon the room as he stepped forward and faced the occupant of the bed with lifted head and hand.

"Let us pray!"

All except himself knelt around the dying woman during the brief prayer, and again while the sacred elements were passed by Mr. Ford. The action was unstudied and simultaneous. The son knelt upon one side of his mother, the daughter upon the other. Into the hushed room flowed the hum of the city below, less distinct than it would have been on week-days and softened by the height of the apartment, into a musical murmur. As the prayer succeeding the administration of the bread and wine was said, and the seven participants of the communion arose to their feet, Mrs. Davis looked up to the pastor:

"I should like to hear my favorite hymn once more on this side of the River."

He comprehended the faltering request. Evidently, it was not the first time she had spoken of the hymn.

The minister's well-modulated voice "raised the tune" and it was caught up instantly by all present—the old air to which our forefathers sang the immortal lyric, and now indissolubly wedded to it.

"Rock of Ages! cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee!"

The dying mother leaned back against the arm her daughter passed behind her head, hands clasped and eyes closed until the last verse was begun. Then, to the amazement of all beholders, she opened her eyes and took up the melody and words in tones surprisingly steady and sweet, carrying the verse through to the end.

"If she had passed away upon the last note, I should not have been surprised," commented Haile on the way home. "It would have been a natural translation."

MR. EVANS, the second elder, had gone home in the street car, leaving the Hailes alone with their host. He drew out a voluminous silk handkerchief and blew his nose before wiping his eyes.

"A beautiful thought! And the scene was the most touching I have ever seen. They are a nice family, altogether. The girl is a bundler in our establishment—Ah! you don't understand the term, Mr. Haile. I venture to say that Mrs. Haile has heard it before?"

"It means someone connected with tying up parcels for distribution among customers, doesn't it?" rallying to answer as lightly as he had addressed her.

"Right, as usual! She will get a better job with higher pay next fall. She is a good, steady, sensible girl, and the boy is bound to get a rise before long. That's the stuff our best business men are made of. Of course I shall see that the expenses of the mother's illness do not pull too heavily upon their resources. It is a good thing for the boy to join the church—and so I told him a month ago or more. Keeps him out of mischief and all that, and is a sort of guarantee of honesty and steadiness in the sight of business men. That is getting to be pretty generally understood in the business world."

"He didn't mean half of what he said!" Stuart insisted to his wife in an after-dinner review of the events of the important day. "As I said today, his heart is in the right place and he leads a consistent Christian life in all respects, besides giving with both hands to every worthy purpose that comes his way. What offends your sense of proportion and propriety is what may be called business jargon. We shall get used to it in the fullness of time. Meanwhile, exercise a little Christian charity of that type that believes no evil."

"And believeth all things?" mildly sarcastic.

THOSE observers who have been predicting that motor transportation will relegate draft animals to the zoological gardens or even to the museums along with the dodo and the great auk, must revise their forecast in view of the 1920 census figures, which show that in the country as a whole there are nearly a million more horses and mules than there were in 1910. In the cities there has been a decided decrease in the number of draft animals from 3,435,900 in 1910 to 2,083,861 in 1920; but this has been more than balanced by the increase in the rural districts, from 23,320,850 to 25,593,078. In 1910 85 per cent. of all horses and mules were in use on farms and 15 per cent. were employed in cities, while now the ratio is 92 to 8.

HOW I ADDED $25 A WEEK TO THE FAMILY INCOME

The story of a mother of two children who became "the best-dressed woman in town" and surprised her husband by her business intuition.

By MARJORIE JANE DILLINGHAM

MY husband and I were married ten years ago. Jack was 21. I was 18. Jack sometimes says he doesn't remember the day. But I know he does. It was the 18th of November, 1911.

For a year we were gloriously happy. Jack wasn't earning a large salary—only $30 a week—but in those days that was enough to keep the two of us in a small but comfortable home. Then came the first baby—a cuddly youngster that we named Dorothy—after my mother.

I had never been a particularly strong girl and for some months after the baby came I was under the doctor's care. Jack had saved a few hundred dollars, but it soon melted away under the rain of bills.

And then—I hate to admit it now—but I began to feel that Jack didn't care for me as much as he used to. Perhaps it was because the cares of motherhood had taken some of the bloom out of my cheeks. Or, perhaps, because I felt we didn't have the money to enable me to primp up as much as in the first years of our marriage.

Sometimes I cried myself to sleep just thinking about it. And, as you might well imagine, that only made matters worse.

What worried me the most, was that Jack didn't talk things over with me the way he used to. I knew he was worried about making both ends meet—particularly after little Bobbie came into the world in 1914. Goodness knows, I tried hard to save a little out of my allowance. But you know how prices began to soar a few years ago. And I was always opposed to going into debt.

THEN one night just about a year ago—it seems almost providential when I think back upon it—I did the simple little thing that was to change my entire life.

And here's how it came about:—

I was reading over the pages of a magazine when I came across the story of a woman just like myself. She was just the average woman—a woman just like you and me.

In my mind's eye I could see my life reflected in hers—I pictured her home as being just like mine—her husband just like Jack—her children and her problems just like mine.

The story told how this woman had been just as discouraged as I was and how she had learned at home, in spare time, through the Woman's Institute, to make for herself at great savings just the kind of pretty and becoming clothes she had always wanted and earn money sewing for other people.

It seemed almost too good to be true, but I decided to find out about it, anyway. So I wrote the Institute. The information I received by return mail was so interesting that I became a member at once and took up dressmaking.

I didn't say anything to Jack at first, for I wanted to surprise him. And surprise him I did when one night after dinner I slipped into a smart and especially attractive dress and walked into the parlor to greet some friends who had dropped in to see us.

They could hardly believe that I had made such a pretty dress myself. And when I showed them all the other pretty things I had made, they were the most surprised people you ever saw.

And right away one of them wanted me to make just such a dress for her.

After they had gone, Jack put his arm around me as he used to do in the old days and asked me again how it happened.

And then I told him all about the Woman's Institute, and how right at home in my spare time, I had learned to make more and prettier clothes than I had ever had, and at a saving of one-half to two-thirds of what I formerly paid.

AND then I told Jack that I was sure I could do sewing for other people and add $20 to $25 a week to his salary. Jack was skeptical at first, as any man might have been, but at last he agreed to let me try.

My first order was for a soft silk dress with the daintiest little hand stitching on the collar, cuffs, waist line and hem.

The fact that I designed my own patterns astonished my customers and it went over town like wildfire.

Soon the work came in faster than I could handle it and I was steadily increasing my prices as I gained confidence in my work.

I made almost every type of dress for women, from chambray to velvet, and for all types and figures. I altered ready-made garments and did remodeling for women and children. I made children's dresses, smocks and rompers. I had been sewing less than two months when I had to advertise for a helper.

The best part of it all is that my lessons and my sewing do not interfere with my home work at all. My customers tell me they don't see how I can keep my house and family looking so clean and neat and find time to do sewing. I can tell them that it is easy when you know the right way to sew.

Today I am making $25 to $30 a week sewing for others in addition to making all of my own and my children's clothes. My husband is as proud as he can be of what he calls my "business intuition," but best of all is the fact that we are now such good pals. We talk over everything together. I really believe he loves me more than when we were married.

The other day I heard him tell some friends of mine that he considered me "the best-dressed woman in town." I don't think one of the old love-letters could have thrilled me any more than that. For I know he meant it.

I am telling you all this because I am just the average woman. What I have done, with the help of the Woman's Institute, I know you can do, too.

For among the members are housewives, mothers, business women, girls at home and in school, and girls in stores, shops and offices. They are of all ages from fifteen to sixty years. The majority live in the United States, but there are hundreds in foreign countries—all learning dressmaking or millinery right in their own homes just as successfully as if they were together in a classroom.

IT makes no difference where you live, because all the instruction is carried on by mail and it is no disadvantage if you are employed during the day, or have household duties that occupy much of your time, because you can devote as much or as little of your time to the course as you desire and just when it is convenient.

The Institute's courses are practical, fascinating and complete. They begin with stitches and seams, taking nothing for granted, and proceed by logical steps until you can design, cut, fit, and completely make all kinds of attractive and becoming dresses, suits, wraps, and hats.

"They could hardly believe that I had made such a pretty dress myself!"

Every step is not only fully explained in words, but is actually shown by means of more than 2000 illustrations—so that it is practically impossible to make mistakes.

You learn the secrets of distinctive dress—how to design and create original dresses, how to copy garments you see in shop windows, on the street, or in the fashion magazines, or how to adapt and combine features that make clothes distinctively becoming.

YOU will also learn just the things you need to know about silk, woolen, linen, and cotton fabrics and their combinations; how to judge their quality, durability, and value; how to make the professional tests that prove whether fabrics are as represented; how to detect shoddy, false surfacing; how to test dyed fabrics for durability of color; how to judge mercerized fabrics; how to know real linen from processed linen.

The Institute's courses are so complete that hundreds of students, with absolutely no other preparation, have opened up shops of their own and enjoy large incomes and independence as professional dressmakers or milliners.

Wouldn't you, too, like to have more and prettier clothes? Wouldn't you like to save money for your husband? Wouldn't you like to contribute $25 a week to the family income? I know you would. It is the wish of every woman. You can do it through the Woman's Institute.

And remember this:—

It costs you nothing to find out all about the Woman's Institute and what it can do for you. Just send a letter, post card, or the convenient coupon and you will receive, without obligation, the full story of this great school that has brought to women and girls all over the world the happiness of having dainty, becoming clothes, savings almost too good to be true, and the joy of being independent in a successful business.

Free Circulars for Investors

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address, on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 90 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2, describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To Invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Circular No. 50 gives complete information on Federal Farm Loan Bonds. They pay 5% and are tax exempt.

Farm Mortgages—details also circulars regarding 6 per cent. First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Send for Circular 38.

Foreign Bonds—opportunities for obtaining Foreign Municipal Bonds with yearly drawings at par giving high average yield of 12 1/4 per cent.—Danish Internal Loans, Norwegian and Scandinavian Bonds. Booklet 48.

Bonds—questions answered, terms defined. A very valuable, non-technical booklet that every prospective bond buyer should have. No. 42.

Selecting Your Investments, Strong Box Investments, Creating Good Investments, are three booklets describing the service and safe, high yield investments of a nationally known investment house. No. 43.

The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co. first Mortgage 20-year 8 per cent. Sinking Fund Gold Bonds are described in detail in Circular 44.

Long Term Railroad Bonds—Valuable information on the better class of Railroad bonds to yield 6 per cent. to 8 per cent. No. 46.

JUDGE US BY OUR RECORD OF 26 YEARS
For 26 years we have paid 6% on Two-Year Time Certificates and for 26 years we have paid 5% on Certificates payable on demand. Back of every Certificate we issue there is the best security in the world—first mortgage on improved real estate. If you have saved as little as $25 you ought to know all about us.

Paul at Ephesus

International Sunday-School Lesson for October 9
Acts 19:1-41

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

THREE lessons are given to the third journey of Paul. Since the one that follows this is about an epistle, I Corinthians, and the next treats of the conclusion of the journey, this study is the chief one pertaining to the longest trip in point of time that the Apostle Paul made. Read as far as Acts 21:15 and mark the entire journey on the map which you are making. Next week special attention will be given to the epistles written on this memorable trip.

For depth of teaching no event is more important than that which occurred twice at Ephesus. You will remember that Paul brought Aquila and Priscilla with him from Corinth, as he was concluding the second journey, and left these faithful workers at Ephesus while he went on to Jerusalem and Antioch. Meanwhile, Apollos, an Alexandrian Jew, came to Ephesus and joined with the two from Corinth in preaching in the synagogue. Now Apollos was very able in proclaiming the Old Testament and even declared many facts concerning Jesus. There was an essential truth lacking in his message, and these two tent-makers sought out the eloquent man and questioned him about his personal experience in spiritual things. They discovered that he understood the necessity of righteousness, but did not know that righteousness could be found only in Jesus Christ. The truth which he possessed made him eager to know the fulness of truth. So he became a ready pupil and learned the "way of God more accurately." He was eager to proclaim the full Christian teaching and soon started for Corinth with letters of introduction and commendation. He was able to show the Jews there that Jesus was the Messiah. But his preaching and personality helped to make divisions, so that some in Achaia said "I am of Paul" and others "I am of Apollos."

Some, even today, declare that it does not make any difference what one believes if only one is sincere. On the other hand, the Word declares "According to your faith be it done unto you." The Apollos experience was repeated with still greater vividness when Paul reached Ephesus. He found twelve men who had gone just about as far as had Apollos. On inquiry it was learned that they knew only the baptism of John. To be sure, it was unto remission of their sins, but that is only the first step in Christian experience. Paul diagnosed the situation exactly and asked, "Did ye receive the Holy Spirit when ye believed," or "since ye believed" as it is given in the authorized version. They had never heard of Him, the Holy Spirit, the Third Person in the Triune God. Then the wonderful story of Pentecost was retold and they were informed of the unfolding experiences of many since that date. Having learned, they desired to be possessed by the Holy Spirit. In their enlarged faith they received trinitarian baptism: "And when Paul had laid his hands upon them, the Holy Spirit came on them; and they spake with tongues and prophesied."

PAUL'S direct question is one that should be answered by every teacher and pupil. After the teacher has answered "Yes," he is in a position to help each pupil know the Holy Spirit for himself. One of the most helpful, compact books on the Person and Work of the Holy Spirit is by Dr. William Edward Biederwolf, and is entitled, "A Help to the Study of the Holy Spirit." Many have such slight knowledge of the Holy Spirit that they say "it" with reference to Him. He is a person, even as is God the Father and Christ the Son. The fullness of relationship with the Godhead is the privilege of each believer.

Following the custom in other cities Paul began his work in Ephesus at the synagogue, where he reasoned and persuaded for three months. When it seemed better to try another plan, Paul adopted a method which was continued for two years. By day he wrought as a tent-maker, and when those hours of hard labor were over, he made use of the school of Tyrannus, which had probably been occupied during those earlier hours of the day. Both Jews and Greeks were in the audience. Luke's description is unusually graphic as he declares "so that all they that dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord." In all probability Paul's influence extended far beyond the city of Ephesus, great though it was. Later he writes to the Colossians, whom he visited or else he reached them through Timothy as a special messenger. The seven churches named by John in Revelation 1:11 are all located in the vicinity of Ephesus and they were doubtless established at this time, though the later residence of both John and Luke at Ephesus is not lost sight of.

Miracles were wrought by Paul through the Holy Spirit, and some who tried to be copyists suffered severely. Unholy hands must not attempt to use holy fire. So effective was the preaching of Paul that many who had used arm charms and possessed so-called books of magic brought these evidences of their superstition and burned them publicly. It was a costly bonfire. Fifty thousand pieces of silver is given as the value, but the equivalent will be better appreciated if we think of the pay for 50,000 days of unskilled labor. When a person reaches the point where he is willing to give up personal possessions because of his faith in Jesus Christ there is strong evidence that the faith is practical. If we were equally sincere there would be a burning of some of our concealed things. There have been other remarkable bonfires in history. All will think of that fire which resulted in Florence from the preaching of Savonarola.

DIANA was the goddess especially revered by the Ephesians. Her temple was in Ephesus and rich trade resulted from her votaries. Paul's preaching made its inroads on Big Business and riot resulted. Demetrius started the trouble when he complained about poor business, because this loud-talking preacher said that Diana did not even exist. Other tradesmen and craftsmen were ready to join the uprising, and soon stirred up others. As an onlooker it is interesting to watch the scene through Luke's vivid description. The frenzied crowd filled the great theater, which would hold more than 25,000, and then got sore throats just shouting for two hours "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." Every time they looked in the direction of the Temple of Diana there in Ephesus they would shout the harder. They had to learn that declaring a statement does not make it a fact.

Then that temple was one of the seven wonders of the world. In recent years excavators had to dig more than twenty feet below the surface to find the remains. Today no worshipper of Diana can be found in all the world; whereas the teaching of Paul is the Gospel of life even as it was in the long ago. A very interesting chapter "Paul as Pastor at Ephesus" is found in "Paul the Interpreter of Christ," by Dr. A. T. Robertson, and another worth-while book by the same author is "Epochs in the Life of Paul."

People believe strange things that are untrue. Even the town clerk did well in quieting the theater rabble, but he actually believed that the old shapeless bit of wood enshrined in the temple was an image which had fallen down from Jupiter. Rather our blessed Christ asks each of us to come unto Him and ask for help in time of need.

"For a great door and effectual is opened unto me, and there are many adversaries," was Paul's estimate of the situation, as he stated in his letter to Corinth written from Ephesus, I Cor. 16:9.

Public Utility Securities

PUBLIC utility services touch the lives of all of us so closely and in so many ways that we have come to regard them as matters-of-course. They are "servants" in the home. They light the lamps, supply the heat, call the doctor the fire department, do the sweeping, washing and ironing. To modern industry they are essential—how essential we never fully realize until by accident, flood or fire we are deprived of them.

Huge Sums Are Needed for Development of These Industries

By H. J. SHAW
(Vice-President of A. H. Bickmore & Company)

How many of us have given any thought to the stupendous task involved in building up these great semi-public works on whose efficient, successful and uninterrupted operation our welfare so absolutely depends? $15,000,000,000 or about $136 for each man, woman and child in the United States has already been spent, and we are told that the era of utility development for the nation's benefit has only begun.

Competent authorities estimate that the electric light and power industry alone will need $1,000,000,000 a year—about $3,000,000 a day—for the next five years, for necessary extensions and improvements. How this money is to be raised, how spent and how safeguarded are vital questions demanding the attention and careful thought of all of us. Increased food production through reclamation of unproductive lands, help in conquering disease, conservation of natural resources, relief from the burden of hauling fuel now borne by the railroads, all these and more depend on the continued and rapid growth of these services.

Let us look back for a moment and briefly sketch the development of these servants of the public, more particularly those which use some form of electrical energy.

In 1882, after Edison had completed the invention of his incandescent lamp, the first central power station was established in New York. Aided by the genius of Edison, Westinghouse, and others, the industry rapidly grew and expanded. At about the same time local telephone companies began to spring up and then came the electric street railway. As each of these new industries must needs use the public highways to carry on business, they at once became subject to local political control operating through the granting of franchises. Then, too, the utility business was regarded as competitive. Rival companies were organized seeking to operate in the same community. Politicians saw in this situation a wonderful opportunity for exacting tribute in return for granting or withholding franchises, and through many other schemes as ingenious as they were devious found opportunity for rich rewards. Rate wars and duplication of investments added to the cost of service.

We may call this period the era of competition. In spite of the difficulties touched upon, new discoveries and inventions so broadened the field that these industries grew and prospered.

IT WAS largely due to the courage and vision of the leaders in the public utility field that many of the troubles experienced during the era of competition were done away with. They saw that the public utility business was a natural monopoly and should be so conducted if the greatest good to all was to result. They saw the waste of competition, of duplication of plants and the economies which would result from combination and centralization. Thus began the era of consolidation and it is still continuing.

Although the process of consolidation cured many of the ills suffered by the utilities and the public served by them, it failed to provide a remedy for political abuses. Agitation due to these conditions finally brought about the inauguration of the first State public utilities commission, in Massachusetts in 1906. Thus began the third era, the era of regulation, which is now in force in 42 states.

Both the public at large and the owners of public utility securities have found in regulation an efficient safeguard of their interests. The commissions have recognized that what is needed is good service and that good service can be had only when rates are adequate and investments protected.

The following quotations from statements made by representative commissions illustrate this attitude:

Pennsylvania. "The public interest demands a solvent utility, rendering adequate service at a reasonable rate rather than a utility struggling against bankruptcy and furnishing only mediocre service because its rates are too low."

New York. "It is far better for the community to yield a slightly larger return to the company than it may be exactly entitled to, in order that it may remain prosperous and furnish the service which the public should have and be a credit to that community rather than to have a corporation in financial distress, because those whom it serves are unwilling to allow it to have a liberal remuneration for its service."

Indiana. "To obtain this money at reasonable rates, public utilities must have credit which will attract the investor's discernment. It can not be emphasized too strongly that the establishment of such credit is really of more vital concern to the communities served than to the utilities serving them."

Michigan. "The Michigan Public Utilities Commission is alive to the fact that there is a great demand for the extension of public utilities in the State. The State can not grow properly unless the public utilities are permitted to grow at the same time. If rates of interest and rates of return upon industrial enterprises are generally 7 per cent., or 8 per cent., or 9 per cent., or 10 per cent., then the rates of return upon public utility capital should, if adequate service is given, be about the same."

IT WILL thus be seen that the commissions have adopted the principle that the public, in regulating its utilities has at the same time assumed responsibility for protecting the capital invested in the public service and assuring a just reward in interest and dividends.

What then of the inducements offered to thrifty Americans to provide the millions needed for the growth of these enterprises? Their business grows with the growth of the country, in good times and bad. Between 1910 and 1920 the population of the United States increased less than 15 per cent., while the number of customers of electric light and power companies increased over 250 per cent. and the amount of electrical energy sold increased over 350 per cent.

Not only is the business growing rapidly and steadily but the earnings are stable. A few months ago a leading financial paper published a list of forty companies whose dividends to the amount of $17,000,000 had been passed. Not one of these was a public utility.

Add to these favorable features the safeguards due to wise regulation and who can doubt that prudent investors, who wish protection and a fair return for their savings rather than speculative profit with its attendant risks, will provide the money which the public utility companies must have if the country's future growth and prosperity is to keep pace with the past?

Make Every Dollar You Save Earn 8%

It is difficult enough to save a dollar. But when that dollar is set aside, if you invest it in Miller Mortgage Bonds instead of depositing it in a savings bank, you can obtain a return of 8%. Furthermore, you obtain the same safety as your savings bank provides.

Miller Bonds are simply mortgages in retail packages. Behind each bond is select, non-speculative property, producing income more than ample to meet interest and retire principal on every Miller Bond issued. And each Miller Bond constitutes a first claim on this select realty and its earning power.

By investing in these bonds, anybody can get an 8% return on his money as easily as the savings bank does, and he will know that he is buying securities backed by first mortgages, just as the savings bank invests its own funds. No investor has ever lost a dollar in Miller Bonds and no one has ever had to wait a day for payment of interest or principal.

Questions and Answers

H. F. N., Greencastle, Pa. Ours is a cosmopolitan nation, and it goes without saying that there can be no drawing the line on that account when any important step is being taken which involves the national welfare. Hence any great event, like the coming Disarmament Conference, affects not a part but the whole people, irrespective of differences in race and religion. All are equally interested in the success of the worthy effort to bring about lasting world-peace and to escape the costly bondage to militarism and navalism. The whole world is tired of war, and practically all the religions are in active sympathy with the movement to abolish it and to substitute international law and arbitration. You write of men who in times past have been found on the wrong side of some public question. Well, if they have reached the turning-point and have come over to the right side now, let us forget the past and give them welcome. We know of no more opportune time to forgive and forget old differences than now, when the peoples of the world are looking forward hopefully, longingly and prayerfully to the burying of ancient grudges so that peace and good-will may have free course. We hold that the Conference which is to meet in the capital of this Christian nation should give full recognition to God, and invoke the presence of the Christ-spirit in its deliberations. And we believe President Harding has the courage to bring this about, especially if he has the united Christian Churches of our land behind him in the great enterprise.

Troubled One, Hurricane, W. Va. Pray for more faith. Don't doubt, for "He is faithful that promised." We have sent your letter to the Prayer League.

H. J. R., Ossining, N. Y., writes: "I have always thought that the 'cloud of witnesses,' of which Paul writes in Heb. 12:1, referred only to the witnesses mentioned at the close of the preceding chapter and that the opening verse of Chapter 12 really belonged there."

A continuous line of thought and argument unites the two chapters, and Paul's purpose was clearly to encourage his hearers to follow the example of the witness of faith pictured in the conclusion of Chapter II. Yet this nowise excludes the application of the passage in a broader sense—a course generally followed by commentators.

J. W., Ishpeming, Mich. All of the civilized nations are now fighting tuberculosis. At the recent Congress in London, 39 different countries were represented. Reports showed that while no absolute remedy had yet been found, science has found many ways of lessening the ravages of the disease, and preventive methods have succeeded well. Permanent sanatoria are increasing. In 1920 there were in the United Kingdom 42,000 deaths, as against 50,000 in 1914 which, considering the hardships of the war, was regarded as a very favorable showing. While all the reports were hopeful, it was made clear that the campaign is still in its early stages.

A Reader in Perrysville, O., has sent us an outline of the new system of Bible Study lately introduced in the Perrysville Public Schools, which can not fail to interest many other rural communities. It is known as the Van Wert System. First, a committee representing all the churches met and elected officers, the Rev. E. E. Campbell, a local pastor, being chosen President. An Executive Committee was also chosen, which included the pastors and two members of each church in the village. The churches represented were the Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist and Lutheran. It is explained that "the system secures week-day instruction in religion for the children without depriving them of the privileges of the public school. In thirty-one cities, Boards of Education have made concessions of time, enabling churches to provide for such instruction without interfering with the plans of the public school. The results everywhere have been very satisfactory. The movement seeks to assist and co-operate with the church in her effort—in the family, the Sunday school, the parochial school and the public school—to further the spiritual character of the rising generation. We believe that for the Church to take at least one-half day of each week for the religious education of the children, solves the problem. The public school has none too much time for itself, but can it spare one-half day each week to more profit? The Catholic Church gives 200 hours per year to the religious education of her children, the Jews 85 hours per year, while the Protestants give 26 hours for this object in one year. This is not enough and an evidence that it is not enough is the ignorance of God's Word, and the immorality of our American youth. But by using the above-named plan, instead of receiving 26 hours of religious instruction during the year, our youth would receive 134 hours."

PROPHECY EXPLAINED

By GEORGE H. PATCH

Brief extracts from the author's preface

"Knowing that many sects and 'isms' have had their origin in human theories and methods of interpretation, I determined, while giving every writer on prophecy a respectful hearing, not to blindly follow any man's theories, nor accept any man's conclusions, without careful search of the Scriptures for confirmation. My own theories and beliefs must also be subjected to the same testing, and conclusions drawn only in the light of the most evident meaning of the Word, without prejudice of any kind.

We cannot avoid having theories if we do our own thinking. Spirit-filled men have divergent theories. We cannot follow them

"This excellent book appears opportunely at a time when, more than in any previous period in modern history, Prophecy is uppermost in the minds of thoughtful men and women throughout the world. This is a wonderful book on Prophecy. It will be welcomed by Christian men and women everywhere. It brings solace and consolation and reassurance.

Mr. Patch has shed a flood of light on prophecy and especially on Revelation. His work cannot fail to be commended by Bible students and Christian people wherever the Bible is read and studied. It is the most important book we have ever published on Prophecy."

Dr. George H. Sandison

A Simple Study Program

Our object in publishing this book is not only to satisfy the very general desire for light on Prophecy, but to lay before all interested men and women in America a new and simple method of studying the whole field of Prophecy, from Genesis to Revelation, from the Creation to the Times of the End, in one study each week for a single year. These fifty-two Lessons, or Studies in one complete, cloth bound volume, we feel sure will be welcomed by all readers of the Christian Herald and their friends. It is our earnest desire to organize all of them in one great Bible Class for the study of this comprehensive and enlightening course at home. Every Lesson carries full instructions.

New and welcome light is shed on the Unfulfilled Prophecies, including:—

*The Day of the Lord;
The Armageddon Battle;
The Millennial Dawn;
The New Jerusalem;
Israel's Redemption;
The Earth Purified and Made New;
The Incoming of the Kingdom;
The Dragon and the Beasts;
The Pouring of the Vials;
The Two Witnesses;
The False Prophets and the Anti-Christ.
The "Great Tribulation"*

These are only a few of the great prophetic topics that are fully discussed and simplified in this book, which contains many surprises for the reader—surprises that will make him more than glad he has read it.

1 Vol. 12mo. Cloth (size, 7½ x 5 inches) 400 Pages of Large Type. Covers the whole field of Prophecy and clears away all difficulties.

"'Prophecy Explained' reveals an unusual knowledge of prophecy both from the Biblical point of view and also of wide reading. The author's exposition and conclusions are evidently the result of much careful and thorough study. In my judgment the book will prove a valuable and practical addition to the books already published on the subject of prophecy."

From a critical review by a well-known Bible teacher recommending the book to the Christian Herald for publication in book form.

Suggestions to the Reader

In Mr. Patch's book the reader will find a new and most satisfactory method of studying Prophecy, which will bring it within the reach of every inquirer. Light is shed upon the fulfilled Prophecies of the past, on those now in process of fulfillment, and those of which the fulfillment still lies in the bosom of the future.

This book may be adapted to a variety of uses in Bible study.

1. The arrangement is ideal for text-book use. It is divided into fifty-two lessons, with most important Bible texts, with questions to draw out the meaning, and spaces after each question for answers.

Each lesson is followed by copious explanatory notes, quoting authorities and giving clear interpretations of Prophecy contained in the Bible. Its contents make it especially valuable to each member of a Bible class.

2. Every Sunday-school teacher will find the study of the book an invaluable aid in teaching classes.

3. All readers of the Bible will find the book a great aid to a clear understanding of the Bible, especially for the references on prophecy. No one who reads and studies the Bible can afford to be without this valuable book.

A boy volunteer acting as traffic officer to aid smaller children to cross a busy street to get to a playground in the West End of Boston

Accident Prevention for Young America

NEAR one of Boston's playgrounds a little child four years of age was playing in a street. A boy of ten years saw the little tot and quickly ran to escort him to the sidewalk. A gigantic motor truck was approaching in the middle of the road. Out from behind it shot a touring car, the approach of which was unknown to either boy, going at a much higher rate of speed than the law allows. The larger of the two boys had just time to drag the smaller safely to the sidewalk before the touring car shot by, the driver having been unable to stop it suddenly, even with the emergency brakes on, because it was doing so fast.

In this case—an actual occurrence—the older boy undoubtedly saved the younger from frightful injury or death. Why did he take the trouble to pull the youngster, whom he did not know and probably never had seen before in his life, from the street? It was knowledge that the little tot was playing in a dangerous place that prompted the action.

The boy who served in the rôle of rescuer is only one of the hundreds of thousands in Massachusetts to whom the ways and means of preventing accidents are being "sold" in an exhaustive campaign to reduce avoidable mishaps in which children figure. If this campaign had not had its effects on the boy, the chances are ten to one that he would have made no attempt to escort the younger from the street, for the philosophy of the average boy and girl, except perhaps, in cases where his or her own brothers or sisters are concerned, has been in the past: "I have to look out for myself. Let the other boy and girl do the same."

One of the chief purposes of the anti-accident drive is to change this boy-and-girl philosophy to: "My duty is not only to look out for myself, but to do everything I can to aid in preventing injury to the other boys and girls. When I see a boy or girl in a position that is liable to result in injury, it is my duty to act to relieve the situation."

THE boy cited in the foregoing incident had been taught as a result of the campaign to act quickly instead of resorting to arguments and threats to carry out the desired end. In fact, he was one of the thousands of boys throughout the State who as a member of a playground class has taken the pledge to escort from the street all young children who appear to be playing in a dangerous place. To have waited until he called an older person's attention to the other's danger in this case would have been fateful; so would such a delay in numerous other cases.

This accident-prevention campaign in Massachusetts is not an intensive campaign to be continued for a specified time. It is to go on indefinitely. It has the backing and active support of many of the leaders in public life in the State. It is being financed privately to a large extent, its supporters getting their dividends through the great satisfaction they obtain in saving the life and limb of the youthful citizens of the State.

Instituted in part by the Safe Roads Federation of Massachusetts about a year ago, the campaign has now grown to the proportions of a co-operative effort in which many organizations and individuals are taking part. One of the leaders in the movement is the Massachusetts Safety Council, made up of public-spirited men and women who are working for the reduction of accidents in many lines of endeavor. The Governor of the State, Channing E. Cox, has given valuable aid to the project and is much interested in its success.

The Safe Roads Federation of Massachusetts is under the direction of Frank A. Goodwin, who as registrar of motor vehicles for the State, is credited with having done more to prevent automobile accidents in the Commonwealth than has been accomplished heretofore by any other public official, regardless of party affiliations. School committees and teachers, community centers, theaters, civic organizations and hundreds of other organizations and individuals throughout the State are co-operating in the drive. Public-spirited men and women already have dug into their own pockets and subscribed more than $10,000 to the venture so far as it concerns the efforts of the Safe Roads Federation and the Massachusetts Safety Council.

INCLUDED among the organizations co-operating in the Safe Roads campaign are the Accident and Health Underwriters' Association, American Federation of Labor, Association of Manufacturers of Massachusetts, Automobile Legal Association, Bay State Automobile Association, Boston Automobile Dealers' Association, Boston Board of Fire Underwriters, Boston Chamber of Commerce, Boston Commercial Motor Vehicle Association, Department of Public Works of Massachusetts, Federation of Mutual Casualty Companies, Highway Safety League, Insurance Federation of Massachusetts, Insurance Society of Massachusetts, Massachusetts Automobile Club, Massachusetts Casualty Underwriters' Association, Massachusetts Motorcycle Association, Massachusetts State Chamber of Commerce, Massachusetts State Federation of Women's Clubs, Massachusetts State Grange, Metropolitan Motor Association, Motor Truck Club of Massachusetts, Mutual Fire Insurance Association, National Automobile Dealers' Association, New England Insurance Exchange.

It has been found that by far the best means of bringing home lessons in accident prevention to young people, regardless of whether they are kindergarten or grammar school age, is through the story form. When they are told a story in which principles of accident prevention are embodied they remember the principles as well as the story. On the other hand, if ways and means of preventing accidents are served to them in the dry form of rules or regulations the boys and girls take little notice of them and no lasting impression is made.

One of the most effective methods yet found for reaching the boys and girls is through a story-form lesson leaflet. These leaflets are read to them by instructors or leaders at playgrounds, in the school yards at recess time and in other places where children gather, including gymnasiums, recreation parks, etc. The leaflets are being sent out by the thousands by the Safe Roads Federation and the Massachusetts Safety Council jointly.

THE text of one of these leaflets, entitled, "Why Children Feared the Chariot," follows:

"If you have been to a circus you have seen the chariots. They have only two wheels, and they go very fast because four horses draw them. The chariot is the oldest wagon in the world. Nobody uses it nowadays except for races at the circus.

"Thousands of years ago, when there were many kinds of chariots, and every army used them in war, a king invented one that had knives, like scythes that cut grass, attached to its wheels. When it was used in battle for the first time it was as great a surprise as the British tanks were in the last war. A whole line of chariots dashed forward and drove among the enemy, the knives cutting down the men who were not trampled on by the horses. The winning army was very proud of its victory.

"But in hundreds of homes in the other country there were sorrowing children because their fathers did not return from the war. After a time the few soldiers who did come back told the story of these terrible chariots and what they had done. Whenever these children saw a chariot dash by after that, they thought only of one thing, that their fathers had been killed. They kept safely out of its way.

"The automobile today is as dangerous, when children run in front of it, as was the chariot that had knives sticking out from its wheels. Last summer, during the long vacation, it killed 66 children and injured 724 in Massachusetts. If you will remember these figures, they will help you keep out of the way of autos this summer. The children of this playground are trying to make a perfect score of no one hurt from June to September. How many of you will take this pledge and promise to keep it?

"I will not run in front of an automobile.

"I will not chase a ball into the street when an auto is near.

"I will not steal a ride on back of a motor truck.

"I will not play in streets where autos are passing.

"I will not run out suddenly from behind an ice cart or a standing auto."

THESE leaflets, it is noticed, carry historic information as well as an accident-prevention method. Many of the leaflets are on a single phase of accident prevention, like the foregoing one, which treats on the dangers of automobiles. The text of another leaflet, entitled "You Can Help the Ice-Man," follows:

"Children always enjoy conundrums. Here is a new one: 'What is it that nobody wants on the coldest day in winter, and everybody wants on the hottest day in summer?' The answer is 'Ice.'

"Thousands of years ago, before any ice had been cut on the rivers and ponds of New England, the people of Greece and Rome made ice from snow. They brought it down from the mountains in the winter, and they pressed it into great holes in the ground, dug in the shape of the ice-cream cones of today. Some of these holes were 40 feet deep and had a door underground. The snow was covered with straw, and a thatched roof placed over the top. The snow-ice that was formed was sold to rich people in the summer.

"When ice was first cut in Massachusetts for private use it was stored away, packed in sawdust, in large holes in the ground, and it was not until a little more than a hundred years ago, when it was offered for sale to anybody, that ice-houses were built to hold it. Frederick Tudor of Boston was the first man to load ships with New England ice and sell it in the West Indies and Cuba, and the first ice sold in London was shipped from Salem and Boston. Two Massachusetts men, Nathaniel Wyeth and John Barker, invented nearly all of the ice-tools that are now used in cutting ice, or in handling it in the ice-carts.

"In every city and town you can now buy ice as easily as you can buy bread from a baker's cart. But there is a peculiar thing about the ice-wagon that you may have noticed. It is built to keep the sun from melting ice within, and the driver's seat is so covered that when he takes the reins to start up his horses he cannot see the children who may be following on behind. That is why so many children are badly hurt every summer.

"One ice company—and there are 250 in Massachusetts—reports the following accidents in which boys and girls were injured last summer:

"Four children were struck by pieces of ice falling from the back of a cart that they were following.

"One boy fell against an ice axe, and another, running behind a moving ice-wagon, cut his lip on an axe that was on the tailboard.

"Two boys were bitten by horses they were teasing while the driver was delivering ice at a house.

"A very young child, playing in the street, was run over.

"The children of this playground are trying to make this a summer free from accident. The men who drive the ice-wagons are also trying to do the very same thing.

"You can help the ice-man if you will keep away from the back of his cart, and not bother his horses. Without the ice-man, there would be no ice-cream cones. So he is a friend of yours and should have your support."

ANOTHER method that is proving very effective in impressing upon boys and girls the desirability of avoiding accidents, and in teaching them how to do so is by instructing them how to play games especially made up to give lessons in accidents and warnings against them. One of these games, called "Traffic," has come into extensive use in playgrounds, in schoolyards at recess time, and other places. It teaches the boys and girls the regulation street traffic signals and gestures used by traffic officers so that they will be able to conduct themselves properly in crossing streets on which there is heavy traffic.

In playing this game the children first mark off on the ground a section representing the juncture of two streets. The children are divided into two groups, one being designated as pedestrians, the other as motor vehicles. One of the older pupils is chosen as traffic officer. He takes a position in the center of the intersecting streets.

One group of children representing pedestrians remain inside a line representing the street edge of the where one of these instructors has made remarkable progress is the case of Albert B. White, a policeman, attached to New Bedford police headquarters. He was first delegated by the New Bedford chief of police to investigate and report of the advisability of giving children instruction in accident prevention. After a thorough investigation he reported that he believed such instruction would prove valuable in reducing mishaps.

The chief of police surprised White by assigning him to the work of giving this instruction. He had had no experience in teaching children. He asked to be relieved of the work. "You can do it," said the chief. "Go ahead." And White tackled the task.

He began in the kindergarten schools. He had been at the work only a short while before he discovered that the best way to serve accident prevention to these children was via the story-telling route. So he spent a number of weary hours in making up stories that would convey the ideas he wished to get across. His stories took from the start and before long his coming to the kindergarten classes was a heralded event.

WHITE made such a good impression that several of the teachers went out of their way to commend him to his chief. He kept up the work of creating stories to carry out the methods he wished to illustrate. At the request of the school authorities he carried his story-telling into the primary grades. Finally he was asked to appear before the upper grades of the schools. The boys and girls of these grades, he told himself, would not want to hear his talks in story form, so he adapted them to the lecture form. The pupils, who had expected stories, were disappointed. The teachers, having heard the stories he told to classes other than theirs, also were disappointed. They wanted to know why he had not given the advanced pupils stories. He told them. Later he gave the substance of his lectures in story form and made a hit with the upper classes, thus proving that even the upper grades much prefer their lectures woven into stories.

The officer succeeded so well in his work that he made new tasks for himself. He is now very much in demand at meetings of boys' and girls' organizations and at entertainments and other gatherings given for children.

Incidentally his talks have not only instilled caution into the children but in many instances have improved their deportment. He laid stress on manliness and womanliness in children. He showed them in story form where it was wrong to destroy property, but even much more of a wrong to try to cover up this destruction by lies. After he talked one day to a group of children in a certain neighborhood, five different ones pounded on doors of houses in their neighborhoods and confessed they had broken windows and were sorry for their actions.

Furthermore, White in his talks corrected the impression that a policeman is a "cop," whose approach is the signal to "cheese it" or vanish. He defined a policeman to them as the father of the children wherever he goes in the sense that he is always willing to aid them in any possible way. A few of the children took the talks too literally and when White has been going along the street he has seen them point to him and proudly declare him their father.

The valuable work that White is doing can be duplicated by police officers or other individuals. In some cities it is being done in a general way; others are laying plans for such work.

THE Safe Roads Federation of Massachusetts and other interested organizations and individuals waited on Dr. Payson Smith, director of the department of education of Massachusetts, and discussed the possibility of instituting regular courses in accident prevention in the public schools. Dr. Smith, although fully in accord with the idea, said that the school curriculum already was overcrowded and that he did not believe it would be advisable to establish regular courses in accident prevention in the schools. Further discussion led to plans that would bring home accident prevention to the pupils in an indirect way in the schools. These plans are being carried out with dispatch.

In arithmetic, for example, the subject is brought out in this way: Instead of dealing with apples and pears in doing a problem, the pupil will often be given sidewalk at one corner of the intersecting streets. The other lines up in the streets to represent automobiles.

Practicing the art of resuscitation on a boy supposed to be nearly drowned—a game of the sort that some day may save a life

When the traffic officer gives the signal for the "automobiles" to go ahead the "pedestrians" must keep on the "sidewalk." But when the signal is given for the "pedestrians" to cross and the traffic officer's hand signal is set against the "automobiles" the "pedestrians" move quickly across the "street." Any child, whether representing an "automobile" or a "pedestrian," who fails to obey the signals of the traffic officer is adjudged a "casualty" and must withdraw from the game and stand one side. "Pedestrians" who run across the street also are counted out. The traffic officer acts as the referee or umpire.

Such games as this not only teach the children but draw hundreds to the playgrounds and other gathering places who might otherwise be tempted to play in the street. Some of the older boys at the Boston playgrounds have become so skilled in the art of directing traffic through practice in the game that they actually serve as traffic officers occasionally when large bodies of younger children are emptying from playgrounds and schools.

PLAYGROUND instruction in Boston and some of the other larger cities of the State covers many phases of accident prevention, but special stress is laid on motor accidents, which are far more numerous than others. The instruction also includes first-aid work through the learning of which the boys and girls have been able frequently to reduce suffering on the part of their playmates and sometimes to prevent death by resuscitating boys and girls near death from drowning, suffocation, etc. Some of the youngsters, especially the boys, are very skillful in the art of restoring respiration.

Special instructors are devoting full time to eliminating accidents in certain of the cities. An instance

The Christian Employer's Opportunity

It Is Simply to Apply His Religion in His Business

I HAVE been asked four questions:

1st. Can a man make a success in business and still be a Christian?
I believe the day is almost here when that question can be answered in this way: That a man cannot make a success in business unless he is a Christian.

2nd. Does a Christian business man get along better with his employees than a non-Christian?
Assuming that he is a Christian man in fact and not only by profession, he surely does.

3rd. What are some of the Christian business men doing for their employees?

That question is a tester, as I believe Christian business men today have got to come closer to living their religion in actual fact in all dealings with their employees than in the past. The trouble having been that a Christian business man simply followed established customs and long-standing attitudes of the world toward their employees. Hence Christ has not come into His own in just one more particular.

4th. Has religion any influence in the business office?

I know many men today who have a private room where they definitely take not only their troubles but all their decisions for prayer. I believe there are more men doing it today than there ever were. Yesterday, the owner of a large Pittsburg daily, in my office, said he would not attempt to write an editorial without his Bible on his desk in front of him.

The third question brings up the whole problem of the opportunities that are before the Christian business man.

I believe Christian employers should see a great opportunity to practice the teachings of Christ by the general adoption of methods in vogue here and there that have not attracted much notice up to the present time.

ONE thing that clouds the question in the industrial world is, to my mind, a mis-statement of the issue. There should be no line drawn between capital on the one side and labor on the other. The line should be drawn between the men who give tolerance and consideration to their fellow man, on the one side, and on the other side those who do not. And by the latter, I mean those who demand what one might term their just or legal rights and who never raise their eyes for a higher vision—clear on through to those who demand the pound of flesh next the heart.

It has frequently been stated that the basic principle involved is strictly one of morals, and that is correct. Christian employers must "watch their step" and see that consideration according to the broad, sympathetic, loving teachings of Jesus Christ, is actually carried out in all dealings with their employees, and that former business customs and attitudes do not prevail—no matter whether they employ one man or one thousand men. And the employers today who are giving their employees proper rest-rooms, group insurance, sharing in the profits or giving adequate bonuses, are no longer leading the van in this work; for we find employers, not necessarily known as Christian men, where far more consideration and sympathetic interest is given. I mean by this, men of the type of Henry Ford and Judge Gary of the Steel Corporation, and surely Christian men must not be one whit behind them.

I am thinking of the wide-open offer to buy or finance the purchase of homes in vogue with the Steel Corporation among its employees for some time, the automatic raising of wages every five years in order to encourage steadiness and satisfy men that their future presence is appreciated. And regardless of what the motive is, these men have shown they are open-minded to the very principles laid down by Jesus Christ, and considerate of their men, and so must every Christian employer maintain a sympathetic attitude if he would make the underlying principles of the teachings of Christ practical in his business life and an actuality in his establishment.

I BELIEVE a welfare organization should be formed in every business unit, and through it the firm should conduct all negotiations and settle all disputes between employer and employee.

A Pittsburg firm of Christian men having established a welfare organization, found one of their man-sonal interest in the purchase of homes, and other constructive work outside of the place of business, to establish a thorough belief in the genuineness of the employers' attitude, that they are really interested in each and every employee.

I BELIEVE labor unions are needed, as many employers are not sufficiently tolerant and have not learned the lesson that they can overcome evil with good, but they themselves beforehand are constantly "overcome of evil" in their thoughts and judgment of their men, many employers forgetting that the men under them are practically all honest of heart but lacking in business judgment and ability to measure up as they have.

But I also think labor unions have miserably failed, especially through political leadership, which is almost universal, and this leadership has shown its class in its utter lack of constructive ability and constructive ideals to lift their men up and aim them toward good citizenship and character, if not Christian principles. Their position is strictly a negative one; always looking for trouble, they are sure to find it, but the possibilities of the welfare organization simply outdistance any labor union so far produced.

Taking advantage of these oversights on the part of unionism, Christian employers can lift their whole establishment beyond the reach of labor leaders, as cited above, through the individual unit of a welfare organization for each and every separate business.

In the matter of hours, as long as men go into business for themselves and work fourteen to sixteen hours a day, either on farms or as merchants or in other lines, and reap corresponding rewards, we must acknowledge that men should also be willing to do it for others if they are able to do it for themselves. From eight to ten hours however, is a fair day's work, but the efficiency of the work should determine the number of the hours. There must be the element of value given and received always in control.

IN THE matter of bonuses or profit-sharing, undoubtedly we must remember it is possible only to help men to help themselves, and those concerns all over the world who have required of their employees to save a similar amount of money to what their employers will give them as a bonus at the end of the year, are having and will continue to have the best results and the only real appreciation of extra compensation from their employers.

I believe Christian employers should organize and set a high standard as indicated here in all matters between themselves and their employees—the higher the better—recognizing the fact that a man's life "consisteth not in the abundance of his possessions," but in a life of helpfulness to others. And we should see on every such place of business, letterhead or business card a proper sign or insignia of this organization. It would soon have a telling effect upon all employers and union labor leaders.

But no matter from what point of view you look at the first move, the opportunity is strictly up to the Christian employer. He must lead in the new Christlike attitude, or no appreciable progress is possible.

An agitator addressing steel workers—one method of tackling industrial issues, a method involving strife between capital and labor. There should be—and is—a more Christian method agers guilty of deceit. They took his case before a committee of their welfare organization and, after stating their side of it, retired. In ten minutes they got a more drastic verdict than they wanted, thereby showing it is possible for Christian employers to give over to a committee of their own workmen the initiative in discharge.

The results here are far-reaching, as can be seen, and that this is the ideal method so far discovered is apparent in the fact that no outside, prejudiced leadership, ignorant of the true merits of the case and the peculiar characteristics of the individual, was permitted to pass on it, but men who not only knew every detail of the matter and were in a position to appreciate and weigh the true facts in the case from every possible point of view, and who were also interested in the success of the business, were called upon to make the decision. This resulted in no criticism of the firm for disciplining an employee, and in consequence no injuring of the pleasant relationship that should exist.

This all came about through several years of deep, genuine, sympathetic interest from the Christian men at the head of the organization in their friendly treatment of all their employees. And I would call attention to the fact that it is possible to actually make matters of wages and hours of secondary importance providing the employer "loves his employees as himself" sufficiently, through sharing of profits, group insurance, rest-rooms, proper and sympathetic consideration at times of sorrow or trouble of any sort, taking a per-

IN a note accompanying this article, Mr. Fraser, who is one of the outstanding laymen of the country and the head of an immense business in Pittsburg, says:

"I believe through the long neglect of Christian employers, the men of this generation must turn in and live their religion with their employees, and no substitution, make-believe, or counterfeit efforts of any kind will take their place. I also believe many Christian men who have made a success in business and occupy the position of employer of a large body of men, have not become Christian psychologists, do not understand themselves or their attitudes sufficiently well to reduce the spiritual teachings of Jesus Christ to the practical operation of their business.

"WITH both employer and employee sitting before the pulpit a complete understanding between the two becomes almost a church obligation. Why should not the church help bring this about? Let the church preach economic and social justice, economy, and thrift. And above all, let the church teach the practical application of the Golden Rule, not as a millennial theory, but as a vital principle for our daily guidance in all the business affairs of today—'Whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them.' The practical application of the text is real Christianity."—Secretary of Labor Davis to the Presbyterian General Assembly at Winona Lake.

A Story of a City Church

By MARION HARLAND

Illustrated by William C. McNulty

MRS. HAILE always maintained that Mrs. Davis's funeral was the first cog in the wheel whose revolutions after many days brought the Associate Pastor to the Banner Church. The consumptive died on the Wednesday succeeding the Sunday upon which she had partaken of the last Sacrament she was to enjoy upon earth. The pastor conducted the funeral services, held by Mr. Ford's orders in the chapel attached to the church. His wife accompanied him and called in the evening upon the daughter, finding her brother at home with her in the desolate rooms from which the home atmosphere had departed. Both were in their sittings in the gallery-pew the next Sunday, and Mrs. Haile, who had kept in touch with Mary all the week, waited for them by appointment in the vestibule at the conclusion of the afternoon service. They walked with her to the Parsonage, three blocks from the church, Mary on the inside of the sidewalk, and James on the outer, "looking quite the gentleman" as Miss Maynard said to Mrs. Wingate next day.

"They were invited to take a family dinner with Mr. and Mrs. Haile," she subjoined. "Mrs. Haile thought it would be so lonely for them at home. Mr. Haile was not with them. He had gone to see old Mr. Johnson, who is not expected to live through the night."

"It is very kind and Christian and all that," responded the Leading Lady. "But such things have their limit, like other so-called duties. And a pastor's wife has no right to indulge eccentricities. She will excite the jealousy of others in the same station of life as the bundler and porter, and offend the taste and lose the respect of those whom she ought to consider. Such notions and such actions savor too much of the socialism that is creeping into many churches. They are destructive of the best interests of the church. I am very sorry for what you have told me—more grieved than I can express. I saw the notice of old Mr. Johnson's death in this morning's paper. There will be another funeral for Mr. Haile to attend! And there are three families of most desirable people whom I have asked him to call upon. They were all in church again last Sunday and were highly pleased, so I am informed. There should be an assistant pastor to do some of the things that will hamper Mr. Haile's influence if he is not careful. The demands of so large and important a parish as ours are too numerous to be met properly by any one man."

THE sentiment grew apace during the summer. The Hailes had rented a furnished cottage in the Catskills for three months. It was a sickly season in town, and there was scarcely a week in which the pastor did not answer a summons to visit the dying or bury the dead.

He rode to the cemetery upon one of these occasions in company with Elders Evans and MacArthur. The deceased had been an early friend of both, although dissimilar circumstances had prevented much intercourse of late. MacArthur was in his accustomed facetious vein of talk and general tone.

"This is the third funeral I have had to attend this week," he complained. "One might say that folks have got a bias for dying this year. Undertakers must be getting rich. I don't mean to be unfeeling, Mr. Haile!"—seeing the disgusted expression of surprise the clergyman could not disguise. "I am a plain-spoken man and we don't deceive anybody by pulling a long face over the passing away of a man like poor old Perkins, who has been a burden for fifteen years."

"But, as I was about to say, you ought not to be sent for on occasions like this. There are plenty of city missionaries who can be picked up for such jobs. Our church is more generous to pay them, and we well to bear in 'Traffic, the little addition in school salaries is teaches the All these signals and us in the they will be at should in crossing street sistant."

Your strength is required for more important work. I am sure our good brother Evans here agrees with me?"

"Entirely!" assented the quiet listener upon the front seat. "It is a foregone conclusion."

"As I have said repeatedly to Mr. MacArthur and others, I was called in the providence of God—as I

What Has Gone Before

SILAS FORD, the dominant figure in the fashionable Banner Church in New York City, is profoundly impressed while on a visit to Marlinton, a few miles distant, by the preaching of Rev. Stuart Haile, whose ten-year pastorate there has been extraordinarily happy and successful. The leaders of the Banner Church have determined on the resignation of their pastor, Rev. Dr. Samuel Stenson, because they believe that at sixty-three he is too old for the best interests of a modern city church, conducted with business-like efficiency, and Mr. Haile reluctantly accepts their call because of the larger opportunities for service. The Banner Church makes much of welcoming the Hailes and stages what its members call the "Unique Demonstration" for the retiring and the incoming pastors. Mrs. Haile finds somewhat trying a lengthy call from Mrs. Wingate, who dominates the women's activities of the church.

A call from Miss Maynard, the parish visitor, is even more effective in revealing to her the deference demanded by the congregation toward persons of wealth and social position: The pastor and his wife decline to limit their ministrations to the rich and carry what comfort they can to the death-bed of Mrs. Davis, whose son and daughter are inconspicuous employees of a wealthy elder in the church.

humbly believe—to be a true pastor, a shepherd, to this flock." Haile spoke decidedly, but calmly. "I could do the work to the utmost of my ability, and to my way of thinking, the poor in this world's goods need to be ministered to more than the rich. I am still young and in vigorous health. When I find myself incompetent to perform the duties of my office, I may ask for assistance. I hope that day is far off. But I am going to run up to the Adirondacks for ten days' fishing next week. That will brace me finely for the winter's campaign."

MacArthur clapped him on the knee:

"That's the best news I've heard yet. Don't think us officious, my dear sir. But we want to take care of you."

YET, when within ten days, an opulent stockbroker, who had motored into the city from his seaside villa to attend a board meeting, dropped dead in his office in hot Wall Street, it was MacArthur who rushed off a telegram to Lake Placid that brought the pastor to New York in time to take the funeral services. Silas Ford was one of the honorary pallbearers, and upon the return from Greenwood bore off Mr. Haile to the Waldorf-Astoria as his guest for the night, the Ford mansion being closed for the season.

After dinner that evening, the hospitable elder invited the pastor to a confidential colloquy in his room. The night was sultry even for August, but the river breeze stole refreshingly through the spacious private parlor of the suite and the two men lounged gratefully in the luxurious chairs drawn close to the triple-sashed windows.

"Before we enter upon other matters, let me deliver this!" began Ford, passing a folded paper to the minister. "Mrs. de Peyster sent it to me last night, when she heard that you would certainly be on hand today. She added that she was very grateful for your coming and thoroughly appreciated the tribute you paid to the memory of her husband in taking the long journey in the middle of your vacation."

Haile unfolded the bit of pink paper with reluctant fingers, his face gathering shadows as he read a cheque for an amount ten times the total of his traveling expenses.

"I cannot take this, Mr. Ford!" he ejaculated, handing the paper back. "It is a gratuity, neither fair wages nor a gift from friend to friend. It was my duty to fulfil a pastoral task at whatever inconvenience to myself."

Silas laid his big hand upon that holding the cheque.

"It is only what is just and customary in such a case. It is done every week of the summer vacation when a pastor is deprived of the respite from his work specified for in the contract between him and the church. Moreover, the family of the deceased will be hurt and probably offended if you reject a free-will offering. We cannot run this risk. Look calmly and reasonably at the situation. As a matter of precedent, we will say. If this were Marlinton, and the family of a deceased parishioner were to send you a basket of roses as a token of affectionate appreciation of such a service as you have done the de Peysters, you would not hesitate to accept it. I dare say that you have received many such testimonials of the attachment of the people you have served?"

He paused to let the argument take root in the unwilling mind that could not deny the force of what was said.

"You may be right—partly!" Haile presently admitted, "but it galls me just the same."

"I have showed you why it should not. Custom and common sense both declare this action to be only a part of what the church agrees to do for the shepherd who tends his flock at all seasons as you are doing. This is an official act—not strictly personal. You have no more right to send that cheque back to the giver than you have to refuse the salary due for the vacation granted to you by contract. As for me, I utterly refuse to do anything so ungracious as to take back that cheque to the widow of the man you buried today. You must do the ugly job for yourself if it is to be done at all."

FULLY five minutes went by before the minister pocketed the cheque without looking at it again. "You may be right, and I am probably in the wrong," he uttered slowly, as if each word had a bitter twang. "I cannot refute what you say, but I am sure that I dare not run the risk of wounding the person who meant to do me a kindness."

"I knew you would come around to the only right way of taking the situation. And let me say that you have done me a personal favor in pocketing that scrap of paper which represents no more to Mrs. de Peyster than the roses we spoke of just now meant to the mill-hand who gave them to you."

He thrust both hands deep into his pockets and leaned back in his chair, his head thrown back and eyes fixed upon the ceiling.

"You think sometimes that I am a crank in some things connected with the interest of the church," he resumed slowly, without altering his attitude. "We have been associated long enough in church work to be able to speak freely of what is so much in the life of each of us. I was brought into the church twenty-five years ago by

The Stuff of Converts in India

What Kind of Christians Do Former Hindus, Moslems and Buddhists Make?

By REV. W. B. NORTON, Ph.D.

TO THE question, "What kind of Christians do converted Hindus, Mohammedans and Buddhists make," I would answer in brief, "All kinds."

There are some good folks in America who wonder if these products of heathenism really experience and enjoy religion just as the pious people of the American evangelical churches do, and there are others who seem to imagine that a person coming out of such absurd, unreasonable and cruel customs as heathenism imposes would be so thankful for the change that he would be nothing less than the highest type of jubilant saint from the hour of conversion onward. I answer again that there are all kinds of Christians among the native members of the missionary churches.

There is the heroic and truly saintly type. In Shanghai it was my privilege to speak to a large audience of Chinese in the building called the "Hall of the Martyrs." On the walls are the brass tablets in which are engraved the names of the Chinese who gave up their lives during the Boxer Rebellion rather than recant the Christian religion. I am not sure how many names were there, but the list covered one side of the wall space, and the inscription said it represented 10,000 such Christian martyrs. Does any one believe that a Chinese or any one else would deliberately choose to have his head cut off when he might save himself by denying Christ and paying worship to Buddha? There are many such martyrs in India as well as in China, and the meaning of the word martyr, as is well known, is witness. These martyrs have witnessed a good confession.

There are many converts in the churches who are working for the mission on much smaller salaries than they could get in other employ. There are those who have given up titles and inheritance for Christ's sake. There are those who have suffered all manner of persecution, banishment from home and the despoiling of their goods, and have done it joyfully.

THESE evidences of loyalty would be sufficient for most persons, but there are others who would still urge knowing about the spoken testimony and the emotional evidences of joy. Well, such persons ought to attend a testimony meeting among native Christians. A distinguished church leader from the United States was in India on a visit and attended a testimony meeting which lasted for an hour and a half. She heard former Mohammedans, Hindus, and even former Brahmin priests, confess Christ and sing the songs of salvation. Finally she was called on to speak. Her words were:

"I have nothing to say. I am simply dumb with amazement at what I have seen and heard."

On the other hand there are some who are not considerate enough of the limitations of those who have become Christians in the mission field. They expect even a higher standard than they are accustomed to see in their own churches in a country where Christianity has been taught for generations.

Such people remind me of certain farmers I used to know in America who entertained fresh-air children from the Chicago slums. The farmers expected the children to be so much pleased with the privilege of getting out into the country that they would be completely transformed at once. Some of them were surprised that such children could be lonesome among the cows and sheep, and even more astonished that the children expressed joy at the prospects of going home again to the slums. Not all farmers had these notions, but some did. "Regular street gamins," they said. Of course they were, and that was the reason they were given the fresh-air vacation. It is true in city slums as well as elsewhere "be it ever so humble there is no place like home."

In a like manner it happens that even truly converted Christians are not always easily weaned from certain heathen customs and habits they have been taught from their babyhood up. They have been used to quarreling and scolding, and do not always appreciate the irreligious significance of a contentious state of mind.

I WAS riding in a motor in one of the cities of India, and we had for a chauffeur a young man who was introduced to me as a Christian. We came to a railroad crossing, and a bullock driver with his slow-moving oxen got in the way of our passage. The chauffeur began giving what the Indians call "gali" and what Englishmen used to call "Billingsgate." In other words he began to abuse the driver in vigorous terms. The missionary looked at him with surprise.

A procession of holy men at a mela, or Hindu fair, where religion and trade are mixed

"Well," said the chauffeur, "gali is all these fellows can understand."

I have heard the same about mule-drivers in America, and I remember a certain chaplain in the army who said that a driver asked him to go over the hill, when they came to a particularly muddy road.

"I've simply got to swear, Chaplain," said the driver. "These mules don't understand anything else, and we've got to get over this ditch."

Mules who have never heard anything else except swearing can understand nothing else. Converts from heathenism labor under the same handicap.

It is not strange, therefore, that occasionally there are fights among native Christians and that occasionally one finds among the Indians those who, like Achan of Joshua's day, have stolen the Babylonish garment and the wedge of gold. Just as street gamins are given fresh air just because they are street gamins, so converts from heathenism must be given special and patient training in the principles of the kingdom of God just because they are converts from heathenism.

There is one feature about the baptism of converts from the non-Christian religions which is not always appreciated in America. When one has decided to unite with the church in America he accepts baptism as a matter of course. Sometimes it means, and of course it ought always to mean, a breaking with the old life and associations in so far as they have been out of harmony with the Christian life.

In the case of converts from the heathen religions, baptism absolutely does mean this separation from the former life. When an individual or village accepts baptism it means the cutting off of the chutia, the lock of hair at the back which marks one a Hindu, the taking off from the neck or wrist of the dori, or string with the seven knots in it, and the breaking down of any and all idols which may have been erected in the home, or mohulla, a shrine or idol common to all. It means the washing off from the face all caste marks, and what is a more severe test than all, it means the contempt and persecutions of those who remain non-Christian. It may mean exclusion from the village well, and if under overseers it is almost certain to mean beatings and especially heavy tasks. In some villages it has meant increased taxation while non-Christians have been exempted.

IT WOULD seem, therefore, that to name the number of baptized Christians is to come near naming the actual number of Christians, especially as there are many secret disciples who try to conform their lives to the teachings of Christ except that because of family and social conditions they are not yet ready to make open confession.

It would be much easier to make worthy Christians out of converts from raw heathenism if it were not for the utter lack of education on the part of so many, and this lack so long continued as to produce minds difficult of learning even after they have a chance to be taught.

One of the general representatives of the denomination who became a little impatient over the small demand for literature on the part of village Christians was given a lesson by a missionary who was up against the real job of making intelligent Christians out of these same villagers. The official on invitation made a personal tour among the villages. He selected a group and out of the group selected one man he thought was the most intelligent. He spent twenty minutes in teaching him the words "Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God." He explained every word to the man and finally asked, "Who shall see God?"

Back came the answer, "Only God knows."

"I give it up," said the official and went away a wiser man.

Because new converts from the non-Christian religions are stupid, illiterate and sometimes superstitious, is there ground for discouragement, or the ceasing of work? Certainly not, for there are enough of the intelligent and devoted kind to show what are the possibilities of divine grace, and also because the very need of training is the strongest possible reason for continuing in the labor of love.

Patience, of course, is needed, and devotion and consecration, on the part of the missionary. But the results are marvelous and lasting not only on the individual but on that individual's community and its life. There is a deep sense of personal joy, too, in the realization that you have been an instrument in the saving of a soul from such darkness as encompasses the usual non-Christian people.

Drawing Nearer to Unity

IN RECENT months the Church Unity movement has made notable progress, especially abroad. Here, where it had apparently spent its force in public assemblies in the earlier stages of the movement, its growth, though comparatively silent, has been none the less deep and sure. The situation in both continents is reviewed in the current issue of "The Constructive Quarterly," which presents timely contributions from distinguished American and British churchmen, showing that the conviction of the need of Christian Unity has taken root more firmly than many of its advocates could have foreseen.

Foremost among the strong voices for Unity is that of the Bishop of Peterborough, who lately urged the need for a united Church in a remarkable address before the General Assembly of the Free Churches of Scotland. "That our present state of disunion is contrary to the character and purpose of God," he said, "I take to be a proposition which no thoughtful Christian will dispute." He referred to the remarkable result of the Lambeth Conference, when a world-wide appeal for Unity was issued, receiving the support of fifty-one American representatives at that gathering. In commenting upon the American delegates' attitude, the Archbishop of Canterbury referred to the religious statistics of the United States as showing no less than 188 separate Christian religious denominations or bodies. This showing he regarded as presenting a peculiarly difficult problem, "and one which revealed conditions indicating the great and growing need of Unity. In justice to the Episcopal influence at Lambeth, it should be stated that in their Unity discussion they disclaim any plan or purpose under which any church should lose its individuality or be absorbed by any other church."

The Bishop of Peterborough emphasizes this in the statement that "no church wishes to be absorbed, and no church with an adequate idea of Unity would wish to absorb another. But reconstruction of present divided conditions is imperative. Here is the Church's opportunity. Yet only a reunited Church can inspire men and nations to a reunited world. If there is indeed to be world fellowship, the Church must supply the motive and show the way. We can dally no longer. By a disunion which continually grieves the Spirit the Church imperils its very life."

One of the strongest voices for Unity is that of Dr. Peter Ainslie, of the Christian Temple, Baltimore. "The seeds of Unity have been planted," he tells us, "and they are growing. Never were the compelling forces for Unity so manifest as today. I name some of them: A divided Church can not successfully evangelize the world. It is a difficult task for a united Church, but for a divided Church it is an impossible one. Attempting to evangelize the world by a hundred or more forces, antagonistic to each other, presents the divided Church at the very outset as the greatest hindrance to doing what Jesus commanded to be done. . . . The winning of the world to Him is dependent upon a united Church. Divisions must be healed if the missionary cause would advance. An infidel world is the price we are paying for our divisions."

Dr. Ainslie further declares that a divided Church "can not properly function in education; hence the educational demands of these times furnish a compelling force toward Unity." And here surely is a powerful plea for educational reform on the basis of including religious training under a system which would interpret religion, not denominationally, but in a manner upon which all the denominations can agree. Another point made by the same writer is that "a divided Church is necessarily extravagant; hence the virtue of economy is a compelling force toward Unity." Nor can a divided Church contend with advantage against the social wrongs of these times; hence the demand for better social conditions is another compelling force toward Christian Unity. The Church "must find the way out of her entanglements of divisions, or lose out in her ministry to the social needs of mankind."

Coming very close to the heart of the matter, especially in view of the movement looking toward World Peace and Disarmament, Dr. Ainslie proceeds: "A divided Church does not count in preserving the peace of the world; the need of international friendship is a compelling force toward Unity. . . . In no nation on the globe did the Church seriously count as a factor to preserve the peace of the world." The ministry and clergy in all communions claimed that the war, with its wholesale destruction of life, would bring a revival of religion and a great "new world," and its impotency has stunned the multitudes who formerly loved the Church and trusted her leadings. Thus, he points out, the Church's example was a help rather than a hindrance towards making the world war possible, if it were anything at all.

Christ Himself is the compelling force toward Unity, and a "divided Church is incompetent to present the mind of Christ to the world." Whatever one may think of the revelation of Jesus Christ, one thing is paramount in His revelation, and that is the unity of mankind. Such are a few of the leading thoughts and conclusions of careful, competent observers, and they should be pondered by seriously minded Christians, and especially by lovers of peace everywhere.

Today the world's peoples are drawing closer together. We have a World Court and all the necessary mechanism which benevolent statesmanship can devise for bringing about a change. The peoples themselves and their rulers seem to be working on a plane of mutual understanding. But history has shown that human efforts, without God and without even the united support of His Church, can accomplish but little. The point has been reached at which the influence of a united Church would count for much in the reckoning. Thus both for its own sake, and for the sake of the world, Unity must be the fundamental basis. There is no other course if the Church is to survive and to regain its lost power and authority, and render it able to perform the highest service to God and humanity.

This strong, logical and up-to-date presentation of the Unity situation, we commend to the thoughtful consideration of all who have at heart the world's welfare and the Church's future. We are at the beginning of a spiritual battle, probably the greatest in history. May God give us power and grace and courage to carry it through in accordance with His will.

Passing of the Peerage

ONE of the sources of pride for many Englishmen has been the centuries-old estates of the British peerage, where age after age the oldest son inherited the great estate of the father, and it remained in the family name.

But a great change is taking place even among these conservative estates and their owners. At a recent gathering of the tenants of the Duke of Portland at Walbeck Abbey, Nottinghamshire, the Duke addressing the gathering said:

"For centuries past landed estates have been handed down from generation to generation. I fear, however, that this state of things is passing away, for with the present weight of taxation and the extremely onerous incidence of death duties, the future may be very uncertain for all landed proprietors. With regard to my own case it may or may not be possible for me and my family to reside at Walbeck, but there is little doubt that those who come after me will not be able to do so."

The tremendous expense of keeping up these landed estates, or at least the amount of money lavished upon them by their owners, is well illustrated by this very estate of the Duke of Portland, which he fears can not remain in the family. There are subterranean passages under the mansion itself which cost over 3,000,000 pounds, or nearly $15,000,000. These were built to hide the noble Duke himself from the observation of the vulgar herd.

The abbey has an underground riding-school 400 feet long, 106 feet wide and 50 feet high, capable of holding 10,000 persons. There is a subterranean ballroom 158 feet long, 63 feet wide and 21 feet high, the walls of which are hung with famous paintings. Both the riding-school and the ballroom are connected with the abbey by a series of tunnels. Other features are large subterranean libraries and a tan-bark course for galloping horses. It is a quarter of a mile long, entirely covered in with glass. Altogether there are about fifteen miles of tunneling.

It is also interesting to note that this Duke is not alone in being obliged to give up his old ancestral home.

The Duke of Devonshire sold Devonshire house in 1919, and Stowe house, the property of Baroness Kinloss, was disposed of recently. Others, who have sold their properties recently include the Duke of Bedford, the Duke of Westminster, the Duke of Rutland, the Duke of Grafton, the Duke of Marlborough, Lord Leonfield, Lord Londesborough, Lord Portman, Lord Camden, Marquis de Castega, Earl Beauchamp, Earl Bradford, Lord Aberdeen, Lord Lovat, Lord Harrington, Lord Harlech, the Countess of Warwick, and Sir Richard Bulkeley.

One of the most interesting features of the Duke of Portland's address to his tenants was this sentence:

"If the passing of this estate from my family to the common use of the English farming community is for the good of the country, I certainly do not complain."

To the mind of the average thinker what the noble lord said certainly points toward more sensible use of God's land than the setting aside of rich acres for one family's pleasure. This same Duke of Portland has had as his own some 200,000 acres of land set aside for his hunting grounds and for personal rent. If the landed estates of England's peers are finally turned over to the agricultural needs of England's common people certainly they will not "complain" any more than the noble duke himself.

Better Movies

THE question is asked by several correspondents whether there has been any improvement in the films since the large corporations and producers made such emphatic promises of reform.

That was more than half a year ago. From several towns comes the statement that locally there has been some improvement. From others the verdict is that the same questionable features still appear, vulgar dance scenes, criminal acts and immodest dress, and other pictures which the film companies themselves promised to eliminate.

The recent occurrence in San Francisco where a well-known film actor was involved in a scandal and arrested for a crime after a drinking debauch has incensed many people against the entire film business. Certain it is that if the witnesses of the affair can be trusted, some of the film performers must change their habits before the confidence of the public in them can be restored. According to several who were present at the gathering which ended in the death of one of the film actresses, they drank so much that several testified that as many as ten glasses of whiskey were drunk by individuals. The curious interpretation of human sin is revealed by one of those present who excused the actor said to be responsible for the crime when he said, "Prohibition was to blame for all the trouble. If it had not been for prohibition, the convivial party would not have been obliged to get cheap whiskey and smuggle it into the apartment!" Is any comment to be made on a condition of mentality that would try to excuse a scandal of a grave character like that?

Of course, it is not true that all film actors are immoral or drinkers or perverted. To make such charges against the entire group is manifestly unfair and untrue. But the films which show immoral and vulgar situations have been so common that the influence and effect of them on the actors themselves must have been very great. There seems to be something in the life of the theatrical profession so abnormal and artificial that for many persons who take it up as a life work the influence after a while causes a degeneracy of mind and morals. This is not a wholesale indictment of the theater or the work of the decent actors, but it is a statement of historical fact, which the theater people themselves acknowledge.

Six months is a long enough time for the film people to prove something to the public if their promises were sincere. Many of the old films that contained objectionable scenes have not been withdrawn and are still running in spite of all promises to clean up the entire business.

What have you really done, gentlemen of the great film corporations, representing millions of money and asking for the patronage of millions of people, old and young—what have you done to clean up your business? The public has a right to ask after the promises you made so solemnly and explicitly. Many of the people who attend the films to not see any signs of change for the better. The recent scandal out on the Coast does not seem to indicate a very decided improvement in the atmosphere of reform.

The Ku Klux Klan

THE Attorney-General of the United States has signified his intention to conduct an inquiry into the organization known as the Ku Klux Klan revived a year or so ago in the South and now extended into all parts of the country. The Klan confessedly proposes to take the administration of justice into its own hands as one of its chief activities, and it has a great number of paid agents in the field recruiting its membership to what may be regarded as formidable proportions. The Attorney-General is right in his determination to inquire closely into its objects and methods. There is no room in the United States for any private agency assuming to seize governmental prerogatives.

Another Treaty Fight

THE treaty fight is on again. With the reconvening of Congress after a month's recess the group in the Senate that became known a year ago as the "irreconcilables" have asserted their opposition to the treaty of peace negotiated with Germany and signed early in August in Berlin. The group is led by Senator Borah, who has served notice on Senator Lodge, Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, that guerrilla warfare against ratification of the treaty might be expected unless certain changes are provided for. The principal point involved seems to be Article 7 of the German treaty which authorizes the United States to participate in the Reparations Committee set up under the Treaty of Versailles. In fact, Senator Borah objects to any reference in the document to the Treaty of Versailles.

What Senator Borah and his associates read into the section is authority for the President to have American representation on commissions organized to deal with economic questions in Europe. Such representation, they believe, would inevitably lead to entanglements in European affairs from which they wish this country definitely protected.

Just how far the newly developed opposition will go is difficult to forecast. The fact that it is almost entirely Republican in character and directed against a proposal by the Republican Administration gives rise to a feeling that some way will be found by reservations or some other means to reach a basis on which ratification will be possible.

In connection with the Senate protest against participation in European conferences it is interesting to note that the day Senator Borah announced his stand it became known that American representatives will take an active part in the meeting of the Allied financial conference at Brussels this week. The Washington Government delegated Roland W. Boyden and Brig.-Gen. H. T. Allen to sit in the conference, with definite instructions to maintain strongly that the United States, through its separate peace with Germany, has surrendered none of the rights accruing to her under the Treaty of Versailles. Insistence will be made that this country be included in any Allied financial agreements regarding payment of the cost of maintenance of the armies of occupation.

There is developing in Washington a very marked conviction that ratification of the treaty with Germany will mean the almost immediate withdrawal of the American forces on the Rhine. These forces now number slightly less than 10,000 men.

The Unemployment Problem

THE conference on unemployment, called by President Harding to meet in Washington, has settled down to a consideration of the variety of problems presented to it. The gathering is most representative, including spokesmen for employers, employees, and charity organizations, as well as economists, publicists and social workers.

The first work of the conference has been the appointment of committees and the assignment to them of the numerous questions into which discussion will be divided, and these committees will devise a form of agenda for the sessions of the whole body.

While this conference is taking its preliminary steps it is gratifying to note that in some sections the acute stage of unemployment seems to be passing with the reopening of industry or the expansion of working forces that have been materially reduced for several months. This is particularly noticeable, from economic reports, in the Middle West, where the influence of a good harvest is being felt. The recent big rise in the price of cotton also has had a good effect in the South. These favorable developments may be assumed to be more or less permanent and should not be confused with the temporary expedients adopted by large numbers of communities to meet local situations. Some of these expedients obviously are dictated by politics and are not sound at bottom, any more than the suggestion that comes from a group in Chicago of a Federal unemployment allowance.

Churches in all parts of the country, in small towns and cities, are finding an excellent opportunity to get closer to their people in this emergency by the establishment of employment bureaus not only for their membership but for any one who applies for assistance. The Bowery Mission in New York is leading in this work both for relief of hunger and by the use of its free employment bureau. It is feeding approximately four times as many persons a week now as it did the corresponding week last year.

The Anti-Beer Bill

THE Senate is in a wrangle over the conference report on the anti-beer bill fathered in that body by Senator Stirling of South Dakota. The measure took its place before the Senate over the tax revision bill by a vote of 31 to 23, which, however, cannot be regarded as an index of sentiment. The opposition to the bill seems to revolve around a fear on the part of some Senators and liquor agents that its provisions will violate the Fourth amendment to the Constitution although, as the Washington Herald says in an editorial:

Why has the sacredness of the Fourth Amendment lain dormant so long, while those probably guilty of offenses against all other laws have been arrested, searched and any evidence of lawlessness seized? Why has this constitutional provision only been discovered and its use only insisted upon to nullify only another and more recent constitutional provision? Is it, in fact, the Constitution or the bootlegger who is sacred?

Governor Harding Optimistic

GOVERNOR HARDING of the Federal Reserve Board, in an address in North Carolina, expresses the belief that "the corner has been turned and that we have passed the most acute stage of the readjustment period. With his finger on the pulse of the financial body all over the country, Mr. Harding feels justified in speaking a word of pronounced optimism, but he emphasizes, at the same time, the fact that prosperity at home is contingent to a large extent on the development of our foreign trade, and the manner in which merchants and bankers co-operate in the marketing of the year's crops. He sees great opportunities for those engaged in agriculture which were not anticipated a few months ago, and it is of vital importance that they receive the co-operation of the merchants and bankers." His insistence on the necessity of building up trade abroad is in line with all the best thought of the day and calls attention again to the

The Changeless Jesus!

A Sermon by REV. CHARLES M. SHELDON, D.D.

TEXT—Heb. 13:8. "Jesus Christ is the same yesterday and today—yes and to the ages to come."

THE world has changed tremendously since Jesus was born. In its ways of living, in its commerce, its transportation, its farming, education, science, business, building, philosophy, and its religious forms of expression and worship.

It is interesting to note the changes in terms of the things that Jesus never saw.

Jesus never saw a railroad train, a telephone, a photograph, an automobile, a printing press, a typewriter, a telegraph instrument, a trolley car, an electric light, a twine binder, a steam engine, a daily paper, a sewing-machine, a moving picture, a public school, a republic, a city skyscraper, a church or a Sunday school.

It would be easy to put down a thousand things that we are daily used to that Jesus never saw or felt. Jesus never saw an anesthetic, or a hospital, as we understand the word, nor a Red Cross society, nor a peace society, nor a missionary society, nor a young peoples' society. The world has changed since His time in its politics, its methods of daily life in the home and on the street, and everywhere. These changes have affected the very thinking and conduct of humanity. They have changed the habits of the race, and made profound differences in its communication and its possibilities for knowledge.

But the one thing that should cause us all the most satisfaction when we think of these changes, is the fact that through them all Jesus has never changed. He is the same now and forever. In a world that is at the present moment restless, and after the manner of the old Athenians, seeking always for some new or strange thing, let us rest down on the mighty truth that Jesus is the same.

IN WHAT ways is He the same?

He is the same in His everlasting teaching of the need of repentance. The first sermon John preached was from the text, "Repent!" The first sermon Jesus preached was from the same text, "Repent!" One sermon was not enough from that mighty text. And if Jesus were to come here again He would probably use the same text.

For what does America need to do more than repent? What is the great need of the world today among all nations? A recent public official in Germany, in a public address given in Berlin and published all over the world, said: "The watchword of those who love the Kaiser is 'Revenge.' Let us learn again to hate!" Can you think of anything short of the most contrite repentance to meet such a spirit?

Here in our own country crime is increasing with tremendous power. In 1910 there were embezzlements amounting to $1,396,000. Last year there were embezzlements amounting to $5,623,819. Burglaries in 1910 amounted to $886,000. In 1920 they amounted to $10,189,853. In other words, crime against property in ten years in the United States has increased ten times and five times. Illegitimate births and divorces are increasing. Greed in public wastefulness is counted by millions of money. Is there anything more needed than repentance for sin?

Jesus has not changed in His teaching about the need of a new birth. Can anything short of a complete change in a man's habits make any change in the political and social conditions that confront England and Ireland? It is not a question of giving Ireland this or that concession in political liberty, it is a question of complete regeneration of the hearts of the people in England and Ireland. It is not a political but a religious and heart problem that remains unsolved. And nothing will solve it except a change of heart—a new birth.

Jesus has not changed in His love of the multitude. He would still look upon the masses as sheep without a shepherd. He would still weep over the city. He would still move among the people, if He were here today, yearning for their redemption.

JESUS has not changed in the matter of His creed. It is still the same. "Love God with all the heart, mind, soul and strength, and your neighbor as yourself." This sums up the one necessity of the Christian life. We are constantly changing our church creeds. The Congregational churches once had long and elaborate creeds covering many pages. Now they have adopted a creed that can be pasted into one page of a church hymn-book.

But Jesus' creed can be stated in one sentence. It is the one everlasting solvent of all the world's political and social ills, and if believed and practiced, it would put an end to war and establish the Brotherhood of Man on earth. For the word "neighbor," as Jesus used it, means the "nigh boor." "Boor," in the old English use meant "farmer." So what Jesus said when He told the world to love the neighbor, was to love the farmer whose farm was the next to yours. He said nothing about the nationality of this farmer, the color of his skin or his position. He was the nigh farmer and he was to be loved. Jesus would still say the same thing. He has not changed His creed. It is still the same and it is still the one great answer to race prejudice and hate.

Jesus has not changed in His emphasis on the first things. He said, "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness and all these things" (the material things that humanity needs) will be added."

This is an economic statement. If the world of business believed this economic wisdom of Jesus, there would follow the greatest prosperity ever known. That precept of Jesus put into practice in the marketplace would result in more human beings having the things that are necessary to physical well-being than have ever known them. It would in time abolish poverty and it would end industrial strife.

This old law of God, as Jesus taught it, has never changed and it never will. If Mr. Gompers wants to see working men enjoy life, let him teach this Jesus' law of the "first" to the labor unions. If Judge Gary or the United States Steel Corporation wants to avoid strikes and labor troubles in the steel mills, let him spoke to the dying robber when He said they would be together in Paradise, is the eternal truth that He would speak again in the class-room and the Church and the home. He has not changed in His knowledge and teaching of the fact of a future life.

JESUS has not changed in His faith in and love for the Church. He loved it and gave Himself up for it. He told Peter that the gates of death could not prevail against it.

At a time when the Church is under fire and criticized by nearly every organization, and especially by experts in social regeneration who have never been connected in any way with church life or history, it is worth while for all anxious souls who love the Church to steady themselves on the foundation of Jesus' everlasting faith in the Church.

With all its faults the Church last year, of all the different branches, had the most successful year of its history. There were over 2,000,000 accessions to membership. The churches of America gave over $3,000,000 to the China Famine Relief. No one knows how many millions the churches gave during the war to every drive and to every call for help. The Methodist Church South has just finished a campaign in raising $52,000,000 for its forward program, and it is now planning to raise $33,000,000 for religious education. The Presbyterians had the most successful year, in many ways, in their history, receiving over 150,000 new members. The Baptists tell the same story of increased memberships and financial advance.

All along the line, in spite of criticism and weakness, and lack of sufficient leaders, and the constant bombardment from press and the secular organizations, the Church as a whole is a power. It is not necessary to prove too much. The Church is not a perfect thing. There are no perfect things in this world. But the Church of Jesus is not a decadent thing, either. The gates of death shall not prevail against it. Jesus said so, and He has not changed in His thought of the Church. It is still and will continue to be His chosen instrument to bring in His Kingdom.

Jesus has not changed in His teaching about the futility of the use of force to accomplish what men or nations need. He told Peter to put up his sword. He who had power to raise the dead never tolerated physical force to put down the tyranny of the Roman Empire. If Jesus were here today He would call on His Church to act together with voice and pen and mass meetings to influence the decisions of the world powers for disarmament and an end of war forever. Jesus is and always will be the Prince of Peace.

WHEN the city of New York was first founded and was known as New Amsterdam, it had only a few small houses at the lower end of the island. It was not like the present city. Mighty changes have taken place since the Bowery was a garden lane, and the Battery a cowpasture. The towering business houses that stand up against the water-line like real crags of the mountain, do not look like the modest and humble cottages of the New Amsterdam settlement.

But through all the changes that have marked the tremendous growth of the greatest city of America, one thing has not changed. Deep down under the humble cottages of the first settlement and the gigantic substrata of the Woolworth tower, is the living rock that runs like a great mountain block under the island on which New York is builded. That has not changed. It has remained there through all the years. The changes in the social, industrial, political, financial, and general life of the people have had no influence to change the rock on which the city is built. It is the same now as when the first house was put up.

Like that, Jesus is the same. The changes in human development, in transportation, in the achievements of science on which we lay such great stress, the changes in the political and social life of men, have not changed His character or His eternal purpose or His teaching. They remain the same and they will not ever change. They do not need to change. They fit the eternal needs of the human soul now as well as they did two thousand years ago.

Thank God for something steady and unchanging in a world of constant change. Courage, anxious souls! Peace, perturbed hearts! Jesus Christ is the same yesterday, today—yes, and for the ages to come. Let the Church rest down on that mighty fact and go forward to conquer in His name. For He is the changeless Jesus of history. He is the same and His years know no end.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Jesus Keep Me Near the Cross," or "My Hope Is Built on Nothing Less."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Psalm 67. A Song of Praise to God for His Goodness.

Sermon—"THE CHANGELESS JESUS!"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The request may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"One Sweetly Solemn Thought" or "How Firm a Foundation."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

Gracious Partner of our work and play, may this hour of worship fit us all the better to do our task with good cheer, to meet our difficulties with courage and our sorrows with patience. May we not add to the trouble of the world by constantly talking about our own. In the silence with Thee for Companion, Thou wilt bear our burdens with us. And that will be sufficient grace for us. In Jesus' name we ask it. AMEN.

apply to the corporation the same rule that Jesus lays down for both him and Mr. Gompers, and there will be peace and brotherhood on both sides. For there will never be found by the industrial experts any law that will settle the controversy between capital and labor except the Jesus law, which does not change with the passing of the centuries.

JESUS has not changed in His teaching of the great commission to the Church. He said, "Go into all the world and make disciples of all the nations," and He would say the same thing again, if He were here. The need has not changed. The same command holds over the church now as it did when Jesus told Peter to feed the sheep and lambs. Obedience to that command is the breath of life to the Church. A Church of Jesus without a missionary program is a contradiction to all His spirit and purpose. He came to give men life abundantly, and the Church exists for the same purpose. There has been no change in the mind of Jesus about the world-wide conquest by His disciples. All power has been given unto Him in heaven and on earth in order to bring all men to Himself.

Jesus has not changed in His knowledge and teaching of the resurrection and the future life.

There is need at the present time of sound teaching on this elemental fact. College graduates from many schools confess openly that, after listening to teaching from certain professors in philosophy, they leave college with doubts in their minds about a future life. But Jesus never had any doubts, and the truth He

The Almond Tree

SUNDAY. Jer. 1:11. "Jeremiah, what seest thou? And I said, I see the rod of an almond tree. Then the Lord said unto me, Thou hast well seen, for I watch over my word to perform it." The almond tree is the first tree to lift the blooms in mastery of winter. It is in flower when all other things are sleeping. It is like a wakeful, watchful sentinel when all the troops are locked in slumber. Or shall we rather say that the almond tree is always first upon the field. No other tree ever anticipates it or takes it by surprise. And so it is with our God. He is the wakeful Presence when all other beings are asleep. The merely clever man, the cunning man, discovers that the place is occupied which he designed to fill alone. God is before him! The enemies of the Lord are always too late. God watches over Israel: He that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep.

Well, here is a young man named Jeremiah, who has been called to an unfamiliar and exacting office. He is fearful before the prospect; he trembles at the demand. He feels his lack of experience. He is miserably conscious of the poverty of his equipment. He shrinks from the task. It will be too much for him. His enemies are many, and they have the double advantage of years and ingenuity. In every emergency he will be out-run. In every crisis he will be out-classed and out-done. "Ah, Lord God, I can not speak; for I am a child!"

And as he walks along the way, buried in this melancholy mood, the Spirit of God directs his eyes and mind to an almond tree as it unrolls its living banners over the wintry waste. "Jeremiah, what seest thou?" And as he gazes upon it, the almond tree becomes sacramental, a vital symbol of still more significant things. It is awake, while everything else is sleeping. "And I," says the Lord, "watch over my word to perform it." The young prophet is not abandoned to the thin armor of scanty experience. He is not left to the mercy of more "knowing" antagonists. His God anticipates all human devices. His servants do not follow a blind leadership. Neither do we walk in our sleep. Following God, we are children of the day, and we walk in the light even as He is in the light.

And thus it is that the servant of the Lord finds prepared ground at every step of the road. "The Lord, He it is that goeth before thee!" God has a plan of campaign: there are no surprises in His warfare: every hostile attack is foreseen and provided for. We are not led by ignorance or by caprice, which is confused a hundred times a day. Our God has eyes! He is Alpha and Omega, and He sees the end from the beginning. He is the first and the last on the field.

And, therefore, with such a Leader, trembling fear should change into songful courage. It is not enemy's country through which we are marching, and where He alone is familiar with the ground. "We are marching through Emmanuel's land!" And we are to step out with a steadfast assurance which is the parent of peace and quiet joy. We are to begin our difficult tasks in the blessed mood of finished achievement. We are to sing doxologies as we go forth to battle. We are to give thanks for the blessings "we are about to receive," and the thanksgiving must be a vital part of our fighting before even the real struggle begins. I mean that battles must be won in our hearts before they are fought in the open field. Jeremiah must slay his fears before he can subdue priests and kings. He must believe in their overthrow before they can be overthrown. He must expect it before it will happen. He must see victory on the way, and he must sing the songs of victory, because he sees his God. That was the way of Jesus, and it must be our way. Our Lord Jesus gave thanks for miracles before they happened. "Father, I thank Thee that Thou hast heard Me!" When that word was spoken Lazarus was still in the tomb; but with the grace of thanksgiving upon His lips, He commanded grim death to loose its bonds, and Lazarus came forth! Jesus believed in the wakefulness of God, and He confidently assumed it at every turning of the way. J. H. J.

The Sin of Jealousy

MONDAY. I Sam. 21:10. "And David arose and fled that day for fear of Saul." Saul the king was jealous of David because of his beauty, his musical talents and his youthful heroism. The king had listened to the song of the people: "Saul hath slain his thousands and David his ten thousands." He, therefore, decided to kill the stripling from the sheepfold, so that his son Jonathan could be sure of the throne of Israel.

Jealousy arises in hearts that are over-sensitive regarding the success of others who may succeed to power. No characteristic in humanity is more despicable and deadly. Jealousy exaggerates the evil, depreciating the good in others. It glories in the downfall of its victim, exciting fear and evil imaginations that have torment. There is no peace to this troubled spirit, no trust in Divine providence; nothing but vengeance can satisfy the cravings of this demon.

Jealousy is suicidal to the soul; it becomes the self-torture of once noble minds. Jealousy is called "the rottenness of the bones" for which there is no cure except the balm of the great Physician. This fatal leprosy of the heart only yields to the Divine touch.

Following in the train of jealousy are envyings, bitterness, strife, war, ruin and death. Jealousy always thirsts for blood. It is the animal and the savage fighting against every other for food and life.

The roots of jealousy are in the natural heart and must be eradicated in order to grow the plant of virtue, brotherly kindness and charity. Paul used the word "jealousy" in the higher sense of devotion when he said, "I am jealous over you with a godly jealousy, showing mercy to thousands." This is the jealousy of love planted in redeemed spirits. Where sinful jealousy abounded, grace did much more abound. Hatred, envy and strife may be changed into a jealousy seeking human welfare; not jealous of people but for people. The black charcoal becomes the diamond; the gritty sand the opal; thus the Divine alchemy extracting the dross, leaves only the pure gold of character, refined and transformed. E. W. C.

The Consciousness of His Presence

TUESDAY. John 1:14. "And the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." Truly it was a holy night when Jesus was born at Bethlehem. It must have been felt—it was felt—by all beholders, angels, wise men and shepherds, that God had drawn unwontedly near to men. God is always near. Radiant spirits, prophets and psalmists, mystics and seers, have believed thus. "Whither shall I flee from Thy presence?"

Francis Thompson in his "Hound of Heaven" sees God as pursuing man, "with deliberate speed, majestic instance." Even so, a veil hides Him from our view. It is the veil of our mortality. At Bethlehem the veil grows thin. Human senses, by God's grace, grow preternaturally keen, and men perceive God. God touches their eyes that they may see how near He is. How does He do it? By music. Earth never before has heard such a melody, even in dreams And by light. A strange star shines out of the rich purple night. Warriors had cried, "God is for us" when the battle was hot and when courage, born of righteous purpose, sustained them. At Bethlehem men cried, "God is with us." That is the name of the Wonderful Child born there, Emmanuel.

But it is a holy hour whenever any child is born. The visible beginning of life is a miracle. The swelling of a bud in April, the emerging of a chick from its shell, is a transformation scene which only its frequency makes commonplace to commonplace minds. It was the sight of a tree which only a month before had seemed dead, but now bursting into bloom, that converted Friar Lawrence from mechanical piety to spiritual joy and power. If we could see with thought-vision the miracle of life's beginning anywhere, we should say, "Surely the place is holy; the Invisible Weaver is at his loom, turning out a fabric of marvelous pattern."

If this be true of all life, how much more true of human life in its beginning. We are commencing to see it. We are taking better care of little children and of their mothers. Blessed is every cradle, every crib where human life is sheltered for a time, the while Christ's star shines down upon us to guide us where we may feel the thrill of the Infinite Presence and the tenderness of the Infinite touch. C. C. A.

The Law of the Harvest

WEDNESDAY. Gal. 6:7. "For whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." We live in a universe where law governs everything. One of the greatest laws in cause and effect is that of sowing and reaping. This involves the consequence of our choosing. Character is crystallized choice. The law of the harvest is inevitable in that thorns always yield thorns and grapes yield grapes. Good seed begets good seed; bad seed begets bad seed. In the quest for good character one must first make the quest for good seed. "Sow a thought and you will reap an act; sow an act and you will reap a habit; sow a habit and you will reap a character; sow a character and you will reap a destiny."

Who sows and reaps the best? Who are the better husbandmen? Those of great faith or those of small faith? Those who consider the laws of God or those who refuse to consider them at all? The law of the harvest is unchanging, immutable, unrelenting, sure.

Thinking men and women are sowing dollars in mission fields, and the harvest will be a converted heathenism. Every Sunday Christian workers are sowing the seed of the Word, and the harvest will be a changed world for the better. Poets are sowing the seed of a beautiful sentiment and idealistic suggestion and in the words of one of them, "The Soul of the City Receives the Gift of the Holy Spirit." Musicians are sowing the seed of the glad tidings of the good news of the Gospel and the world learns to sing the new song of redemption.

What is the best thing you have ever done? What are the nature and the quality of the seeds you are sowing in the field of the world? Your answer will tell you what your life is, for life is the seed of Eternity for weal or woe. "He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing bearing his sheaves with him." R. B.

Pruning Time

THURSDAY. Job 14:7. "There is hope of a tree, if it be cut down that it will spread again." On a winter night you hear the wind shriek through the lashing branches of the trees and in the morning, walks, lawns and hillsides are covered with twigs and branches. Did you ever think God had been doing His pruning? How is it the trees upon a thousand hills remain ever trim and green? The answer is "Our Father is the husbandman." Not merely sunshine and rain but storm and wind fulfilling His word.

Sometimes He uses severe methods. An ice storm covers every bough and twig with a load exactly proportioned to its diameter and then when the forest is transformed into an ice palace the winter blast smites it. Crashing branches and snapping trunks. What desolations He seems to work in the woods! But spring returns and reveals what has really taken place. Dead twigs have broken off, branches weakened by insects have yielded, diseased trunks are fallen. The things that could be shaken have been removed. The living that could not be shaken are thus allowed to remain. Lo, the forest has renewed its youth and vigor.

So our Father is the husbandman of human lives. He reveals to us His Son, Jesus Christ, and through Him the foundations of a kingdom which can not be shaken, and it is with thankfulness we are able to offer sacrifices that are well pleasing to God and undergo His pruning. Men who seek this world's pleasures and human successes, forgetting God, live for a kingdom that will pass away. Only the Christ has victory eternal. H. H.

The Call to Sacrifices

FRIDAY. John 15:13. "Greater love hath no man than this; that a man lay down his life for his friends." No one can touch the Christian religion even on the surface, without being impressed with its persistent call to the heroic. "Easy religion" makes little appeal to manly men and womanly women. The call to mix in, have a good time and enjoy the social hospitality of the Church makes little impression on serious, virile manhood. And if that task be a great one, involving sacrifice, the more moving are its claims.

Back of all sacrifice is love—love of principle, or country, or friend, or love of God. The call of Christ, like the Macedonian summons, is still danger-fraught and full of pain and death. That is, it is full of danger and death to personal interests and worldly glory. The cross still stands in its historic place—squarely in the path of every disciple. Jesus calls His followers to come out from the crowd, to show His insignia, to march under His direction, to sacrifice—literally lay down—our money, our time, our sympathy and personal interests—for His cause. Sacrifice does much to promote the cause of Christ in the present age. For money is crystallized blood and bone, time is life, sympathy is the energy of the soul and personal interests are so obtrusive. Some of these are dearer than life and to them unreservedly is love's most heroic expression. H. P. H.

The Impossibility of Neutrality

SATURDAY. Matt. 12:30. "He that is not with me is against me." There is no such thing as neutrality. We are either on the Master's side, or we are on the side of His enemies. Inertia is sometimes more difficult to combat than hostility and aggressiveness. The unorganized indifference of church members does more harm than the organized unrighteousness of the worldly-minded. The evils that exist on every hand are no more a subject for deep concern than the fact that we allow them. An old English church has painted on its wall a crude fresco in which Christ and His disciples are represented as pulling against the devil and his allies. That is not a picture for the twentieth century. Christ's conflict today is not so much with the active forces of evil, as with the moral inertia of the world. R. B.

Apperson's Fourteen Points of Superiority

1. REAL RIDING COMFORT—Because of proper distribution of weight and carefully selected springs, driving comfort is provided not only at ten miles but also at fifty miles per hour. You actually rest as you ride.
2. EASY TURNING RADIUS—You can turn an Apperson with its 130-inch wheelbase around in  $38\frac{1}{4}$  feet. This means you can get in and out from curbs easily and can turn nicely in the average city street.
3. INSTANT PICKUP—In the traffic of the cities you need acceleration. The Apperson glides from 1 to 40 miles in 20 seconds.
4. SAFETY ALWAYS—Deceleration also is much needed both on the city boulevard and country road alike. The Apperson comes to a standstill from 40 miles in 40 yards—in 4 seconds.
5. HIGH SPEED—You can travel as fast as road conditions will permit in an Apperson—and the car rides easily and smoothly without sidesway or vibration.
6. SLOW SPEED—You can drive an Apperson at walking pace—in high. This helps in traffic and it does the work quietly and smoothly.
7. EASE OF CONTROL—Drive an Apperson slowly in crowded traffic or send it over the road at high speed—and see how easily it steers. There is no arm fatigue on the longest jaunts. It is responsive to the touch.

How to Judge The Value of a Motor Car

8. A REAL HILL CLIMBER—Motored with a powerful eight cylinder Apperson-built engine you need not fear the hills. It walks up them at the speed you desire.

9. FREEDOM FROM ANNOYANCE—When you purchase an Apperson you buy freedom from the many little annoyances which bother the average motorist. This car is made practically complete in the one plant by skilled men who know how.

10. ARTISTIC DISTINCTION—This is a manufactured custom made car—the body by a prominent New York designer and the chassis by the Apperson Brothers, America's foremost automotive engineers. In the Apperson style and honest construction are combined.

11. ACTUAL ECONOMY—Like the "Jack-Rabbit" whose name it bears the Apperson is light upon its feet. It is easy on tires and gives maximum mileage with minimum oil and gasoline consumption.

12. PROPER WEIGHT—It is light—as light as good construction will permit—yet heavy enough to insure safety and riding comfort.

13. SMOOTHNESS OF OPERATION—A smooth liquid flow of power is provided for the Apperson. There are no "rough spots." The controls are all within easy reach and simply operated as well.

14. SERVICE—Last but not least the Apperson Manufacturing Company has completed arrangements for the rendering of prompt service the country over. When you drive an Apperson you have it for use all the time.

Let me tell you more about my Baby Book

My volunteer clinic work and my correspondence with thousands of mothers have taught me to know most of the problems which distress those who are entering the blessed but trying state of motherhood.

Of course, lots of things you leave to the doctor, and you should, but unfortunately most doctors have never been mothers and cannot always comprehend a mother's view-point.

What I have tried to produce is a text book for mothers, written by a mother. It tells how to prepare for motherhood and seeks to guide you through those first scary weeks when Baby seems more like a miracle than a human being. It tells about food, clothing, bath, first aids, nursery furnishings and hundreds of other such things.

I am sure you will find it helpful, and doctors and nurses who have read it assure me that everything in the book is in accord with sound, modern practice. It is fully indexed for constant reference.

My book is published by The Mennen Company, for which I am glad, because I think their Borated Talcum and Korakonia have contributed more to babies' comfort and happiness than any other preparations I know about.

Although the book is finely bound and illustrated and would ordinarily sell for at least a dollar, The Mennen Company will mail a limited number for 25 cents. I hope every mother in the United States gets a copy—and consults it every day.

Lovingly,
Belle.

The Needs of the Village

By HARRISON A. TREXLER, Ph.D.

Director of the Bureau of Municipal Research, Whitman College

THE surveys of the Interchurch Movement experts opened the eyes of the public to enormous spiritual weakness, financial waste, denominational overlapping, and general inefficiency in the rural religious situation. As portions of the findings were published from time to time we were rudely awakened from our reveries of smug self-satisfaction. The researches of our Bureau of Municipal Research in Whitman College have but substantiated the Interchurch surveys.

During the last year the Bureau has made an investigation of the general conditions existing in towns of from 300 to 3,000 inhabitants in the states of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho. Questionnaires were returned by the mayors of 150 such villages.

One mayor mourned the fact that his town had too many weak churches. In his little city of 1,400 people were sixteen denominations which were endeavoring to hold their memberships intact. On the other hand, a Sunday-school worker stated recently that there was a thinly populated rural district in the same state containing over 3,000 farmers, ranchers, and villagers who had no regular church service whatever.

We found that the great social need of the 150 villages investigated was not more churches, better schools, or more policemen, but healthy, wholesome forms of amusement for old and young. Only a handful of these villages had a troop of Boy Scouts and none boasted of a unit of Camp Fire Girls.

Under the conditions existing in the small towns of the West—and it is quite possible that they are little better in the East—can we wonder that the "real live" boy or girl leaves the farm and the hamlet and goes to the overcrowded city? Rural life may be healthful and quiet but young people demand more than singing birds, lowing kine, and babbling brooks to stir their imaginations and satisfy their social cravings.

NATURALLY the primary function of the Church is not that of offering amusements. But mankind, old and young, craves excitement of some sort. The Western villages have seemingly lost the virility of frontier days. The boisterous horse-play, the rollicking laughter, the gaming, and the tippling are largely echoes of the past. The cowboy carries a gun only at Fourth of July parades or in the movies. There may be "gun-toting" on the Mexican border but elsewhere in the West the Redman grows fat and tubercular on the reservation and the homesteader's fences have reduced the range to unromantic cattle farms.

With the disappearance of the coarseness and the picturesqueness in Western life has also gone much of its vitality and "punch." Life in the villages which dot the map from the Missouri to the Cascades is usually sodden, unromantic, and listless. The villagers are mostly of good Anglo-Saxon lineage. They deserve a better fate than the "passing of the frontier" has left them. The rural telephone, the free mail delivery, and the parcel post have greatly increased the conveniences of life, but they have also made less necessary the personal communion which the old days gave.

From the questionnaires received the following social and cultural needs of the small town and rural district are vitally felt:

Why could not the churches, with the advantage of their wide-spread organization, introduce itinerant libraries for the use of the smaller centers? Most of the villagers would welcome the chance to utilize an up-to-date collection of books. Well illustrated juvenile books would certainly be very popular.

Why could not the churches exploit the Boy Scouts and the Camp Fire Girls? The idealism and chivalry of these organizations appeal very strongly to the imagination of the young. Several of the mayors of the towns investigated saw the utility of such diversions for their children.

Why could not the churches introduce a system of moving-picture programs of the better variety? Reels dealing with travel and the plots of the better juvenile classics would serve a great need in the little rural center where the children are often kept from the professional "movie" by careful parents who, with reason, fear the influence of the cheap vampire, elopement, and dare-devil reels which usually come to Jonesborough and Smithville. Here I feel that the church has a great opportunity which, as amusements now go, would not be excessively expensive.

Could the churches better invest a few thousand dollars than in the organization of lecture bureaus for the purpose of sending popular speakers to the villages? In a winter's season a group of half a dozen men and women could appear in every town along one of the transcontinental lines from St. Paul to the Pacific Coast. Lectures on Hawthorne, Longfellow, Edison, Lincoln, Roosevelt, music, art, or agriculture would be highly appreciated. Lantern slides would add greatly to the public appreciation. The writer has had experience along this line and his lecture on the Holy Land, sometimes with slides and sometimes without, was an event in the wee villages, while the jaded and sophisticated denizens of the larger centers would come out for nothing short of tales of murder, rapine, and carnage.

Why could not the churches develop into an elaborate system the community-house idea? In towns too small for a school gymnasium and auditorium the people have little chance to mingle in a civic capacity. Several of our mayor friends stated that their towns needed "civic centers" and "places for public entertainment."

I REMEMBER visiting a little Montana town some time ago to deliver the annual commencement addresses to the high school graduates. The exercises were held in a commodious frame edifice used as a gymnasium and assembly hall. This structure was built by the Congregational church for the use of the young people of the countryside. Part of the funds were raised in the vicinity and the balance was furnished by one of the church boards. I later learned that the project had been tried with success in other towns. I doubt if that church or any other ever invested a few hundred dollars to greater advantage. The villagers proudly referred to their "community-house" and it was in daily use.

The community-house brings us to the "little theatre" idea. Amateur theatricals are very popular. Why could not the church either send coaches to develop this artistic side of child life or co-operate with the schools in giving plays suited to the locality?

The above suggestions and many others are practicable and are needed. Contentment makes good citizens and it makes good Christians. Lack of wholesome amusements means either the under-social nutrition of the child or his mal-social nutrition. It means the stunting of the future citizen and the growth of a criminal class.

Nine million Americans living in 10,000 villages and some millions more residing in the surrounding country need the aid of the churches in securing social and intellectual as well as moral and religious development.

The churches could carry out a co-operative scheme which would remove from the small towns the stigma of deadness and apathy. It is certain that the realization of such a campaign would react in such a manner that the churches would wax stronger in every village so blessed.

More than one of our mayors complained that the churches of his community had little influence outside of their own membership and did little for the social and intellectual life of the people. It is only by being useful that any organism can escape atrophy and ultimate uselessness. Before us is the problem. How will it be met?

an example of this sort: Five children were playing in the road. An automobile came along and injured two, who had to be taken away to a hospital. How many children were left?

Subjects for themes and essays now include such titles as "Tell What You Have Learned About Accident Prevention," "Name and Describe Ten Ways in Which Accidents Can be Prevented," "Compare the Safeness of the Playground with that of the Busy Street," etc. During school exercises pupils give recitations frequently on accident-prevention methods and various phases of the subject. In drawing, accident-prevention subjects often are being substituted for branches, flowers, cubes, cylinders, etc. The Safe Roads Federation of Massachusetts has offered a prize for the best safety poster drawn by a public-school pupil.

Boy Scouts' organizations and others of similar nature are rendering valuable aid to the movement by instructing children in the arts of avoiding accidents and first aid, about which they have learned a great deal through competent instruction in their own associations.

The drive has extended to continuation schools, the pupils of which go to school one or two weeks, then work for a corresponding period of time in a factory. With these pupils more stress is laid upon avoiding injury by carelessness around machinery than by automobiles. Talks on accident prevention are being given constantly to factory executives, who in turn impart the knowledge thus gained to their workers. Not many years ago it used to be said that when a man went to work in a factory, shipyard or certain other kinds of industrial establishments he was subjecting himself to danger of injury. Today, according to statistics in possession of the Safe Roads Federation, more people are being injured by automobiles in the streets than while at work in the factories.

THE Federation is working on the theory that educational work in preventing automobile mishaps will bring far greater rewards than an overdose of Legislative action, which frequently narrows down to one group passing laws against another with consequent unsatisfactory results.

"Let's all get together and take constructive action that will reduce the number of accidents," is the attitude of the Safe Roads Federation.

Preventing accidents to children is only one phase of the Federation's activities, its work extending to many branches of accident prevention. The leaders in the organization realize that the problems they must meet in reducing accidents to children through automobiles are constantly growing larger in proportions because of the steady increase in the number of automobiles in the state. In 1920, 278,687 motor vehicles were registered in Massachusetts, while during the first six months of 1921 the registrations totaled 315,040.

Every new motor vehicle registered increases the accident hazard, for few if any new thoroughfares are being built. With the constant increase in motor traffic in mind, the Safe Roads Federation and the other organizations are striving to extend their accident prevention work among children fast enough to keep abreast of the situation. They are meeting with success, for the number of motor accidents in which children figure is being slowly but constantly reduced.

the most awful sorrow that could come to me. I have had but one child—a fine boy in whom my soul was bound up. I lived and toiled for him and dreamed by day and by night of what he would be to me when he was grown. I toiled like a slave to increase the business he was to help me build into the biggest concern of its kind in America. From the time he could understand anything pertaining to trade, I began to drill him in business methods. He was the smartest child of his age I ever saw. Everything I touched prospered, and when he was twelve years old I took him into my confidence and let him know what my ambitions for him were. Then—he died! after three days' illness!"

In the silence that ensued the muffled roar of the streets below was to Haile the resistless flow of a cataract bearing all earthly hopes and ambitions into the "Fixed Gulf."

"Dear friend!" he murmured in an unsteady voice. "God help you!"

A BIG hand clutched that held toward the silent figure.

"That was what He did! He drew me out of the horrible pit in which I was wallowing and broke slowly upon my mind as I could bear it that He had prepared some better thing for me to do than wasting life in mourning. And when I could think and take up my work again, He put into my head and heart the determination that the Church should take the place of my boy to me so long as I lived. My wife is the only living creature to whom I told this, my great secret. And she has kept it. She knows that everyone of the thousands I have given to the institutions connected with the Church, that stands in my heart for our boy, are given in his name. Folks say that I am daft upon the subject of running the church upon business principles. I hold there is no reason under heaven why the noblest institution ever established for the good of mankind should be managed in a slipshod way that would disgrace a corner grocery. And to do this there must be capital and plenty of it."

"Now, Mr. Haile, you may understand, maybe, that the Church means more to me than to any other of our members. There is one thing more, you ought to know—maybe. I think almost everybody has a grain of superstition in his make-up. And I believe as surely as that you and I are sitting here that I was 'led' to stay over Sunday in Marlinton that first time I ever heard you preach and that some Power I could not see put it into my head that you were the man to succeed Dr. Stenson, and the idea never let me go until you were installed as pastor. My wife will have it that your being about the age our boy would have been by now had something to do with my notion. However that may be, I thank God every day that I stuck to it and that you have proved that I was not hypnotized or anything like that when I was instrumental in bringing you to us."

"So much—and altogether too much—for that part of the story of that part of my life. I had no idea of opening the book to you tonight. Maybe that is more hypnotism," with a half-laugh. "What I had in my mind was to insist upon your having an assistant in some parts of your work. You are still young and robust, you say, and we want to keep you so. I have been casting about in various directions for the assistant you must have before the hard work of the winter begins, and so have others. It is our sole, main duty to watch over you, and when I say that, I mean the Church itself. We have been on the track of a man who may be what we want. He is a Mr. Miller who has been doing evangelistic work in Pittsburgh for five years. He would like to come East and to have a settled charge instead of going from one Mission to another. He is a fair preacher and the work he has been doing fits him admirably for what we would give him."

"Anselm Miller?" said Haile slowly. "He graduated from Columbia a year before me. I have heard of him as an evangelist. He is a good fellow."

SOMETHING caught at his throat and had to be cleared away before he could speak again:

"But I had not supposed—I had no idea that matters were so far advanced—"

The choking returned and he gasped out the next sentence:

"The heat is stifling! If you will excuse me, I will go to the window for a few minutes?"

"All right! all right! We may expect warm nights at this time of year." Ford's voice was kindly.

Stuart Haile was leaning far out of the window. The city's mysterious roar, never stilled from midnight to midnight, went on beneath him—the throbbing heart of restless humanity—"Life's unresting sea!" He forced himself to review the queer story to which he had lent an unwilling ear. It was, to his apprehension, more like the confessions of a monomaniac than the experience of a sane Christian man. Silas Ford, "had been brought into the Church" as he had chosen a spiritual director, by a mingling of what he would have classed as "business principles" and superstition. Yet all that he did and said with relation to the institution that had filled the place of his dead son in heart and action had the stamp of churchly approval! In imagination the pastor heard the cry that reached Moses upon Sinai:

"These be thy gods, O Israel!"

Was the Golden Calf to stand beside the Cross? He beat his clenched fists upon the stone window-sill and looked despairingly toward Heaven, and then he saw a single star break through the purple murk of the summer night and shine upon him, above the tall roofs across the street. His eyes did not leave the star while he prayed for peace and for light, for strength to abide steadfastly in the Faith once delivered to the saints and immortal in all ages.

Silas Ford uncrossed his legs and stood up, as the minister approached him some minutes later.

"Got cooled off?" he queried, yawning. "I have had a refreshing snooze. Heat doesn't worry me as it does some folks."

"I must apologize for my apparent rudeness," said Haile, the light of a great peace in smile and tone. "I traveled all night and have hardly slept two hours in the twenty-four. I thank you for the confidence you repose in me in telling me so much of your inner life. It shall not be abused, you may be sure. Now—don't you think both of us would be more comfortable in bed than anywhere else?"

CHAPTER XIII

EARLY in October was held the meeting of church members and officials that settled the question of the Associate Pastor. Of course his superior in office was not present, but he had a detailed report of the proceedings from half a dozen sources. Miss Maynard's was almost a verbatim rendering of Thomas MacArthur's speech. She hurried around to the Parsonage early next morning to be sure of finding husband and wife at home.

"Mr. Ford spoke well and feelingly of your disinclination to 'shunt off'—that was the forcible way he put it—any of the duties to which Providence had called you upon the shoulders of anyone else. He went on to say that while we all honored you for the feeling, every thinking man and woman who had the interests of the church at heart must acknowledge the necessity of relieving you of certain minor duties that consume time and energies which might be better devoted to superior affairs. No one man, however gifted—and we all appreciate what your talents and personal attractions are—could visit all the sick, attend all the funerals, get acquainted personally with all the new people that are coming into the church since we installed a popular preacher, and keep up the tone and style of his pulpit services."

"He was applauded when he sat down

Copyright, 1921, by The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co.

"Winter and summer, whatever the road conditions, the truck on Goodyear Pneumatic Tires delivers its cargo punctually. Our Goodyear Cord-equipped truck carries 180 tons of milk a month, making a 40-mile trip into Minneapolis every day, 75% of the way over hilly roads that in winter are almost impassable to solid-tired vehicles. In a year's hauling, it has missed just one day. It carries three times as much as a team and wagon could, and the better service it makes possible has doubled our customers. The additional freight we haul for neighbors frequently pays the expenses of an entire trip. The cushioning action of the pneumatics protects the load and holds down repair bills. Our Goodyear Pneumatics have averaged 13,000 miles, and their full usefulness has been brought out for us by the regularly provided Service of Conservation furnished by the Goodyear dealer."—John Rogers, Dairy Farmer, Eden Prairie, Minnesota.

ESPECIALLY in the kind of hauling that demands a daily mastery of difficult road conditions, Goodyear Pneumatic Truck Tires demonstrate an unfailing tractive power, trouble-free activity, and dependable strength.

They are designed and built particularly for the work a truck must do on country roads and in off-the-road hauling, through soft fields and down farm lanes. They cushion the truck, the driver and the load, and they protect improved roads.

Goodyear Pneumatic Truck Tires are made by the two-cure process, for greater strength and longer life. They are thicker through the bead, where ordinary pneumatics often develop weakness. They have a tough and lasting ply construction, exclusively Goodyear. Their All-Weather Tread not only secures traction in the thickest going but at all times puts the full strength of the tire under the load.

Actual experiences of farmers with motorized hauling on Goodyear Pneumatic Truck Tires are reported to those interested by The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company, Akron, Ohio and Los Angeles, California.

after saying a good deal more to the same effect. Among other things he spoke highly of Mr. Miller, mentioning as one recommendation that ought to have weight with all of us, that you and he were fellow-students in the University.

"Then,"—laughter separating the syllables as she talked—"the 'Banner Punch' arose in his glory. He had an open Testament in his hand, but only referred to it once during his harangue. 'I have been reading in the Book of Acts,' he began, 'of a trouble similar to ours, that overtook the early Church. The Grecians complained to the Hebrews that their widows—that is, the Grecians' widows—were neglected in the daily distribution of charities. He referred to the Testament here—'So the twelve Apostles said, 'It is not meet for us to leave the Word of God'—that is preaching the Word—'and serve tables.'" He shut the book. 'I hope you all know me better than to accuse me of tampering with the revealed Word, when I say that in the modern church the question is whether or not the pastor shall neglect his pulpit duties to serve Tabbies such as are in every congregation—sentimental soul-sick women of varying ages who demand the attention of their spiritual physician in season and out of season. This branch of pastoral work should be delegated to an assistant, and if possible to a practical man, who recognizes the nature of the complaint and uses commonsense remedies. There is less distinction in this sort of practice than if the head surgeon were called in. Upon inquiry, I find this true in nineteen out of twenty instances. Also—and this I say willingly—if the pastor be handsome and engaging in manner, the more frequent are the calls for his services.'

"Some laughed at that, but Mr. Ford who was in the chair, rapped for order and 'hoped what Brother MacArthur had said would be considered in the further action of the meeting.'"

THERE the narrator halted. The grave faces of her auditors did not encourage further reports. She felt chilled and did not hide her chagrin.

"I hope you aren't scandalized by anything I have said of good Mr. MacArthur," she said when, after a few more remarks she arose to go. "He is your loyal ally, Mr. Haile, and nobody judges him by the rules that apply to other men. I wish you had heard how warmly he spoke of your talents and consecration and all that, just before we came to the vote, which was unanimous."

"Thank you!" Haile had arisen with her and held out his hand. "I am too painfully conscious of my own imperfections to be critical of others' idiosyncrasies. And I know Mr. MacArthur too well to doubt his loyalty to the church he has served so long. I heartily endorse the opinion of Mr. Miller as expressed by the unanimous vote of the meeting."

"I envy your talent for saying the pleasant thing without lying," said the wife when the husband returned to her after escorting the visitor to the outer door. "Your diplomacy is really Machiavellian. I wish I had more patience with all this ecclesiastical machinery. I am sick at heart, Stuart! You know as well as I do—and as well as every intelligent man and woman in our church understands, that if this buffoon were not a millionaire several times over, he would never be allowed to outrage decency by such blasphemous tampering with the Bible."

"You are excited, my love!" began Stuart, putting a force upon himself that he might soften her asperity.

"And what wonder!" she exclaimed. "The thought entered my mind last Sunday as I went into church and saw the name and the date of the erection of the Banner Church that it might be well to have, instead, a bas-relief of the Golden Calf. Perhaps the devil instigated me, but the idea fastened itself into my mind and stayed there. I know just how Moses felt when he throw down the tables of stone."

With the swift reactionary impulse native to her she began to laugh.

"Did I tell you, dear, what Esther said when I asked her last Sunday what Moses did with the tables of the law when he saw the people worshipping the golden calf? 'Smashed them to smithereens!' answered the child without the slightest idea of irreverence. Don't be vexed with me, dear! I do hold my peace even from good—that is to say righteous condemnation—except when I am talking myself out to you. You never have such evil imaginings."

He looked steadily down into her eyes, her hand still fast in his.

"The all-pitiful Searcher of Hearts alone knows how mistaken you are, precious child! Not a day passes in which I do not pray again as with strong agony of soul—'God give me grace to be dumb until He gives me leave to speak!' Since it seems to be His will that I should have an assistant in the vineyard to which I believe He called me, I could not choose a more congenial associate than Miller. We had a long talk together when he was in New York last week. Both of us could wish that we had heard of the action of this meeting through some other medium. But perhaps it may have braced us for others that are to follow."

EVENTS followed thick and fast in the next fortnight. If the incumbent of the Banner Church pulpit was not fully advised of what portion of public and of personal service was to be relegated to the Associate, it was not the fault of his parishioners. If it were deemed expedient that the applicants should receive counsel direct from the fountain head and not at second-hand his sense of humor rallied to his help for the nonce, and his faithful helpmate bore her part bravely in what she styled to her only confidante, "the scuffle."

Mr. Miller's home was to be with a widowed sister who gave up her residence in Troy to come to his. For the month that must elapse before the new quarters were made ready for his occupancy, the newly elected official was, at their cordial invitation, the guest of the Hailes.

It was an excellent arrangement for all concerned, decided church, parish and outside well-wishers. The two clergymen became better acquainted in a week than they could have been in a year of professional intercourse. A smaller room adjoining Mr. Haile's study in the Church House was fitted up for his assistant. It was light and airy and more luxurious in appointments than might have seemed to accord with the office of a subaltern. This was Silas Ford's doing, and excited no little remark from observers not yet fully cognizant of that personage's proprietary claim to the organization that had taken the place of his son in the life of the Man of Business. He had set the chief in his place of authority. He had suggested and carried to a successful consummation the plan of giving him a lieutenant. He set the seal upon the transaction by presenting the subordinate with the furniture and the library that filled three sides of the study.

"He tells me that you and Dr. Barrows made out the list of books," said Miller one wintry afternoon, as the two men sat in friendly converse before the fireplace, which had been Ford's last contribution. "The selections were admirable. The books that served my turn in Pittsburgh are in the apartment my sister and I are to occupy. The poor old things would be shamed by the smart bindings of those!" waving his hand toward the shelves. "It was a right princely gift. I am afraid to estimate the cost—it would make the obligation too heavy."

HE LEANED over the table beside which they sat and tapped it nervously with his long, thin fingers. He was tall and spare, with a pale, aquiline face out of which brown eyes sought his companion's wistfully. He was younger by two years than the man he faced, but he might have been ten years his senior.

Haile smiled reassuringly: "Don't vex your righteous soul on that score, old fellow. The whole outfit is a bagatelle to Silas. It is set down in his mental expense book under the head of 'CHURCH' in capitals a foot long. The Banner stands alongside of the Business which enables him to ride his hobby to his heart's content. Don't look as if I were not appreciative of all that he does. He would tell you that it is all 'cold business.'

"Silas Ford is a product of the Mighty Middle Class that is the mainstay of civilization the world over. It is the spiritual hope of nearly every church, and ours is no exception. Tradespeople who are doing yeoman duty in the commercial world; who may be rich in time and may never rise above the level of 'comfortable circumstances'; professional men, each with his clientele of patients or clients; bank clerks and small dealers in stocks—these with their families compose for the most part the congregation that fills the side aisles and sittings far back in the center aisle. They attend weekly prayer-meetings and lectures, send their children to Sunday school and contribute systematically. I need not add that among them the pastor finds more encouragement of his hopes of spiritual growth in this field than anywhere else.

"But—and here is perplexity! There is no social cohesion among them, as a rule. A good woman, of whose piety I have no doubt, told me last week that she had been a member of our church for five years and is not personally acquainted with twenty people in it. She often leaves the church at the close of the service without exchanging a word with anybody. 'It is all right,' she said. 'The fact that I attend the same church with Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Robinson does not oblige me to invite them to dine with me or even to let me call upon one of their days at home. It is the same in all city churches.'

"Granted!" I answered. "But you do not endanger your social standing by bowing to the fellow member whom you brush in the aisle, or by inquiring after her health as both of you are leaving your pews after service, or by exchanging comments upon the music or any other part of the exercises in which you have both been engaged. Surely the fact that you belong to one and the same church should be an introduction to mutual good-will as binding as the Masonic grip and password are to the members of that order.' She said she had never taken that view of the subject before and was by no means sure that it would work as well in the church as with the Freemasons, who comprehend just what the grip and other signs mean.

"At our church parties in the chapel, things are a little better. But too often the acquaintanceships formed there are ignored when the women meet elsewhere. This is but one of a dozen inconsistencies in the daily walk and conversation of those who profess to serve and love the same Father and to be members of the mystic body of Christ, that vex my soul day and night.

"I am counting upon your co-operation in the endeavor to mitigate if we cannot overcome the evil. And by the way, my dear boy, let me say now how much pleased Mrs. Haile is that your sister has accepted a seat in the Pastor's pew. Mrs. Haile has often complained of feeling lost in that roomy pew with nobody but the two children and herself in one end. Now that Mrs. Thursby supports her at the other end, it has the air of a real family pew. She charged me, too, to remind you that we shall expect you both to dinner on Sunday night, as usual."

advisability of creating a better understanding in the United States of foreign affairs. The development of world trade depends to a marked degree on a sympathetic appreciation by the public at large of world conditions that can be obtained only by a careful following of international news and discussions of international affairs, life and customs. Purely from the selfish standpoint it is worth while to know what the rest of the world is thinking and doing.

1,100 Killed in Explosion

ONE of the most devastating explosions in the history of modern industry has occurred at Oppau, near Mannheim, Germany, resulting in the death of 1,100 persons and the injury of nearly 4,000 more out of a total population of about 6,000. The explosions originated in a gas tank in a big dye-making plant where chemical experiments were in progress. The town of Oppau was virtually destroyed. A French army division co-operated with the German authorities in relief work and has received the official thanks of Germany for its efforts.

Proclaims a New Kingdom

THE revolt in India against the government has assumed new and more serious aspects with the proclamation of a Mohammedan kingdom by Seethikoya Tangal of Kumaramputhur. He has pronounced himself governor and warned his followers against looting and other excesses. An official British investigation discloses that the government troops sent into the disaffected districts are experiencing much difficulty, owing to the extreme mobility of the rebel forces and the nature of the country in which they are operating. The Crown officers are placing the most dependence on the prospect of starving out the natives by holding the main roads and garrisoning strongly a few of the strategic points. While the Tangal proclamation affects only a limited district in the hills beyond Mysore, it has some traditional significance, because it was here that the Hyder Ali rebellion began in 1774, that was not suppressed until 1799. The natives still sing of the events of that rebellion and are making it a rallying cry today. In an effort to alleviate some of the danger in India, a legislative committee recommends the immediate repeal of some of the repressive measures in force, with the exception of portions of the Unlawful Associating act and the Seditious Meetings bill. Despite the political unrest, reports from correspondents indicate that the prohibition campaign being prosecuted largely through American inspiration is progressing rapidly.

Disarmament

PREMIER LLOYD GEORGE has decided that the pressure of home problems will keep him from coming to the United States to attend the disarmament conference. The newspapers in England and the United States have shown a great deal of interest in the news and are devoting facetious columns to conjecture as to whether the frank expression by Lord Northcliffe last spring of his qualifications as a delegate had anything to do with his decision. Lord Curzon also is disqualified because of health and preoccupation in European affairs so that the composition of the British delegation remains in the dark.

Intimation has come from Tokio that Japan is fully in agreement with Secretary Hughes's agenda for the conference, and the same information comes from Paris concerning French reactions. This agenda follows, in outline:

LIMITATION OF ARMAMENT

1. Limitation of naval armament—Basis of limitation. Extent of limitation. Fulfillment of conditions.
2. Rules for control of new agencies of warfare.
3. Limitation of land armament.

PACIFIC AND FAR EASTERN QUESTIONS

1. Questions relating to China—Principles to be applied.
2. Application to subjects.
  - (a) Territorial integrity.
  - (b) Administrative integrity.
  - (c) Open door—Equality of administrative and industrial opportunity.
  - (d) Concessions—Monopolies and other economic privileges.
  - (e) Development of railways.
  - (f) Preferential railroad rates.
  - (g) Status of existing commitments.
- Questions relating to Siberia. Similar questions relating to China.

You may have the lovely neck and shoulders you've always wanted

How a new discovery in diet makes physical beauty easy

YOU know of many pretty faces and lovely skins that lack one essential charm—the physical beauty of lovely neck and arms and shoulders made prominent by modern dress.

If you lack the winning graces of a full, beautiful neck, and pretty arms and shoulders, you should know that the real cause of the trouble may be some error in diet that is preventing your natural and graceful physical development.

And don't think something to improve your physical development is not clearly needed because you feel well. You may never be actually sick but still the absence in your food of a certain substance called vitamine may be robbing you of sorely needed physical graces.

The most eminent nutrition experts and medical scientists acknowledge that yeast has great power to build up the body quickly and gracefully, and for this spectacular reason—yeast actually creates an appetite for other foods.

Try this simple test. Eat a small amount of Yeast Foam three times a day and see if you do not only enjoy your meals more but actually eat more other food.

Magic Yeast—Yeast Foam
—just the same except in name.
At your grocer—10c package.

This extraordinary quality of Yeast Foam to make other foods attractive and enable persons with lowered vitality to actually eat more is second in importance only to the new discovery that yeast itself contains more of the body-building vitamine than any other food. Yeast Foam, therefore, will not only create a desire for more food, but in itself will act as a tonic and a builder of tissue—good healthy tissue, not mere fat.

Yeast Foam also acts upon the cause of skin eruptions by furnishing vital elements often lacking in improper diet—the principal cause of internal disorders that result in so many ruined complexions. The most obstinate cases of skin affections have been relieved by three cakes of Yeast Foam a day from three to six weeks.

Eat a third, half or whole cake three times a day before meals

Don't allow yourself to be denied the benefits of Yeast Foam, just because it seems new and strange that yeast can be eaten. It's a wholesome, edible food; and you'll soon like the taste.

Many eat the yeast cake plain, followed with a little water or milk.

Some prefer to take a bite of yeast cake followed by a bite of cracker. Others carry a package of Yeast Foam around with them and eat a cake at convenient times.

It's the same Yeast Foam you know so well as a bread raiser. Begin eating a cake or two a day while awaiting more interesting information which we shall be glad to send free.

NORTHWESTERN YEAST CO., Dept. A14,
1750 N. Ashland Ave., Chicago, Ill.
Please send free instructive booklet, 'Dry Yeast as an Aid to Health,' telling the interesting story of the wonderful new use of Yeast Foam.

How the Man in Maine Buys Oregon Apples

COMMERCE lives through the interchange of products. California fruits are sold in Maine. Shoes made in New England are worn on the Pacific slope. Automobiles from Detroit traverse the Florida sands; the North smokes Southern tobacco. And so it goes.

Advertising has played an all important part in fostering business growth. Without it we would retrograde half a century, or more. Business would stagnate; large institutions which build cheaply by large production would fade into oblivion; we would live in total ignorance of many things which might add to our wealth, health and happiness.

The bread and butter of business depend on advertising, and your interest in it.

Read the advertisements. They will be as productive of results to you as to the companies that pay for them. In half an hour, or less, you can learn much of many things that go to make life what it is.

Read the advertising. It enables you to get more for your money by telling you what to buy. It is your guide to what's good to get.

How Can We Apply the Golden Rule Today?

AT FIRST glance this is a difficult question to answer. At second glance it is one of the easiest questions in the world to answer. The answer is simply this: "By living in such a way as would meet the approval of Jesus Christ were we in daily transaction with Him in all our comings and goings." There is not a relationship of life in which the Golden Rule is not practical. In business? Yes, in business. In school? Yes, in school. In the social realm? Yes, in the social realm. In all public and private endeavor, let the Golden Rule be applied, in the world of capital and labor.

The Golden Rule is the sum and substance of the Gospel in its teaching of neighborliness and unselfishness. Every individual must seek a concrete way of applying the Golden Rule, but when it becomes an individual effort it makes for collective beauty. History has given us some remarkable men and women of notable achievement and conspicuous success and occasionally we find a set of "guiding principles" or "rules of life" attributed to their success and greatness. These "principles" and "rules" may be reduced to one "principle" or one "rule" and it is, "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets."

Lessons from the Patriots, Past and Present

C. E. and B. Y. P. U. Neh. 4:1-14

READ the dramatic story of Nehemiah and note how his patriotism built the walls of Jerusalem. There is one notable incident in the recital, and it is found in the answer he sent to the enemies who would prevent him from succeeding. Nehemiah's words were, "I am doing a great work . . . why should the work cease while I . . . come down?" Nothing could tempt this patriot from the task he had chosen, and nothing could allure him from the path he was treading.

We are reminded of Abraham Lincoln in his determination to rid the land from the blight of slavery, laboring in the midst of heart-breaking odds and the target of many who would interfere with his great purpose. In Nehemiah and Lincoln we have splendid types of courageous purpose, sterling convictions and righteous determination. History, biography, autobiography, the poetic epics of nations and the romance of Christian progress and civilization are crammed with inspiring incidents and stirring episodes of such indomitable labor and unflinching heroism. All the blessings of this age we trace back to these sources of God-led and Holy Spirit-inspired men and women whose philosophy was, "Be sure you are right, then go ahead."

The voice of the majority is not always the voice of God. One man, plus God has often changed the course of history and the map of empire. Instance Jesus, inspirer and leader of all noble action and heroic leadership. It is written that He "steadfastly set His face to Jerusalem." In other words, being on God's side, He faced Calvary for the redemption of the world. John Wesley said, "The best of all is, God is with us." He could say that because he knew that he was with God. And to come back to Lincoln, was it not he who said, "I am not concerned whether God is on our side, but I am concerned whether we are on God's side"? When man forms partnership with God, he is on the side of the winning party.

The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

MRS. S. F. Y. acknowledges answered prayer and writes: "I wrote you last January to pray for our daughter who was then in the state hospital and whose mind seemed almost gone. He heard and answered our prayers and today she is with me, busy about her work and caring for her little boy. I give God all the glory and honor."

From "A Sister" in New York City comes this request: "Please intercede for me that the dear Lord will pour out upon me the spirit of prayer and supplication and intercession in rich abundance. Also please pray that I may regain love for reading the Word; I did abide in Him and His words abided in me, but alas, not now."

M. M. C. writes: "I am very much interested in the Prayer League, for I do believe in prayer. I have been sick for three years, and a cripple for one year, and I want you to pray for me, that God may heal me and enable me to walk again."

Rev. C. B., Ind., writes: "I am a retired minister and have gone over the country preaching the Gospel for forty years. I am fairly strong for my age and am still called on for funerals and as a supply. What I want is the prayers of the League that I may be patient and sweet spirited until the train comes to take me home. I do not want to become bitter and sour."

Mrs. H. E. H. writes: "I am in trouble. My daughter, with whom I lived, died, and I am not wanted here any more. Pray for me that God will provide for me and find me another home."

"Please come to my aid, for I need help," writes Mrs. D. "Pray for my husband, who is fast becoming a drunkard. Pray that he may overcome this habit, which is fast destroying our family peace and happiness."

Mr. Jabez Galloway of the Victorious Life Movement, Mt. Airy, Ga., submits this call to prayer: "Every one who reads this, please pray for a Scriptural revival for fifty miles on every side of your own home, as center of your prayer zone. Also for worldwide revival. John 15:7; John 14:14."

Mrs. G. J. G. asks prayers for a revival at Mt. Hope School House; A. M. S., in behalf of the community at Farmington, Me., and Mrs. M. A. H. G. asks prayers for the Church at Mesa, Colo.

Pastor William L. Brown writes: "Will you please pray for our revival on the Leonia charge? Pray that God may save souls." And Pastor J. N. A. Marshall, N. C. also asks prayers for a glorious revival in his church.

Paul Writes to the Christians at Corinth

International Sunday-School Lesson for October 16
I Cor. 1:10, 11; 13:1-13

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

WHETHER the pen is mightier than the sword, the old subject for debating clubs, it is certain that the influence of the pen lasts longer than that of the spoken word. Paul's messages were powerful but their direct influence reached to the third generation only in rare instances. The letters of Paul are even mightier in their power today than when written in the first century. Very special attention should be given to the study of the epistles of Paul in this course of six months on his life. Letters are the subjects for study in the lesson of today, and those which present Philemon and II Timothy. The study should become of permanent value and so constructive that whenever any letter of Paul is read both the general and the special relationships will be in mind. Today our attention is called to the first letter sent to the church at Corinth and to a particular chapter in that remarkable communication. In looking at the topics for the different departments in the Sunday school, it will be noted that the intermediates, seniors, young people and adults are urged to make a study of I Corinthians, while primaries and juniors make a study of love as portrayed in chapter thirteen.

To understand rightly this or any epistle there must be a background of history which portrays the local conditions of those who are addressed. If this was not accomplished in the lesson for October 2, "Paul in Corinth," it is not too late to become well acquainted with the Corinth of Paul's day. In the three years since he had left Corinth for Ephesus and Jerusalem changes had occurred. Communications by Chloe and others had reached Paul, while he was working for more than two years at Ephesus, showing that divisions were arising among the members in the church of Corinth. Factions were favoring certain leaders. Abuses were growing up, and this is scarcely to be wondered at when we know the base idolatrous and immoral conditions in that isthmian city of Corinth. Paul wanted to go at once and help the young believers in person, but he had a duty to the Christians and others in Ephesus, because of that great door which was there (16:9). Timothy was sent as a substitute.

LATER Paul started for Corinth and while on the way further word from Corinth reached him in Macedonia, where he dictated the second letter to Corinth. Some think that there was still a third, a lost letter, to the same church. Read I Corinthians if you have not already done so. It is an essential preparation for even a general understanding of this lesson. Then make an analysis of the book and write it on some of the blank space in your Bible at the beginning of the letter.

The following is a suggested outline, but do not accept it except as you find by your own reading that it portrays the book. Factions in the Church, 1-4; Church Discipline because of Immoral Practices, 5-6; Marriage, 7; Meats Offered to Idols, 8-10; Abuses in Worship, 11; Spiritual Gifts, 12-14; The Resurrection, 15; Poor Offering and Personal Items, 16. It will be profitable to choose a special title for each chapter; then by glancing at these sixteen words or phrases you will have the whole book in review. There are some unusually great verses that you will wish to commit to memory, together with their location. At least three sublime subjects have special treatment: the words used by your pastor in administering the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, 11:23-27; the Love Chapter, 13; the most classic reference in the entire Bible to the Resurrection, 15. Go through the book again and make your own additional selections of precious gems. You will find the subject matter quite different than in other letters of Paul. He has little to say here about doctrines, as in the letter to the Romans. The purpose is to give practical instruction for daily living. It is a wonderfully human letter from a helpful friend.

Four letters resulted from the third journey and each one should be read and analyzed if you have not already decided upon your working divisions. In addition to I and II Corinthians, mentioned above, you have Galatians and Romans as the result of Paul's stay of about three months when he finally reached Corinth. You will remember that I and II Thessalonians were written while on the first missionary journey.

Having enjoyed the general survey of this letter you can next make a special study of one chapter, namely the thirteenth. "For moral elevation there is nothing in literature equal to this chapter. No Plato or Seneca ever uttered a sentiment of such transcendent beauty," is the opinion of Cross, which is concurred in by increasing multitudes. Every one knows about the study of this love chapter, written by Henry Drummond entitled, "The Greatest Thing in the World." Most everybody read this little book in the decade when it was written, but many of the present generation have not done so. You have then a great pleasure, and you will do as others have done—read the book a number of times. Love will have a fuller meaning as you see its constituent parts by means of Dr. Drummond's spectrum.

There was discord in the Corinthian church, immoralities added to the nest of troubles and many were insisting on the right of exercising personal liberty. To help each sinner and to produce a harmonious working people, Paul showed what love would do. He did not deny their virtues and present attainments. The exhortation in the last verse of chapter 12 is the introduction to chapter 13: "But desire earnestly the greater gifts. And moreover a more excellent way show I unto you." Then comes the love portraiture.

YOU were requested to read this epistle. Now you are urged to commit the Love Chapter to memory. Use the revised version in doing this or at least adopt the word "love" in place of "charity," as found in the authorized version. The word used in the Greek is "agapao" and is found in English in the word agape, meaning the love-feast observed in the early Christian church. It is stated that from childhood Queen Victoria repeated I Corinthians 13 each day. Dr. Tarbell gives the following outline division for this great little chapter; I, Essentialness of Love, 1-3; II, Characteristics of Love, 4-7; III, Imperishableness of Love, 8-13. Again it is suggested that you make your own divisions if you can find a better one. One continuous purpose in writing these studies is to make the reader a student in constantly doing research work.

This epistle, as was the case with the others, was dictated by Paul, and was concluded by a very personal message or benediction in Paul's own hand. Dean Stanley gives a fascinating picture concerning the impression created as this Hymn of Love was first given to the world. "We can imagine how the Apostle's amanuensis must have paused, to look up into his master's face at the sudden change in the style of his dictation, and seen his countenance lighted up as it had been the face of an angel, as this vision of divine perfection passed before him."

Paul makes love something that is very positive and active. He exemplified his preaching on this subject by his constant attitude and actions. As the church in Corinth read the message, they could not but say, "Yes, that is just the way he lived when among us."

A War on Film

On the film that ruins teeth

Dental science has declared a war on film. Millions of people, half the world over, have joined it. And leading dentists everywhere are securing new recruits.

This ten-day test will show you the results. Make it and note the change that comes in cleaner, prettier teeth.

Makes teeth dingy

Film is that viscous coat you feel. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. It makes white teeth look dingy. And most tooth troubles are now traced to that film.

Film is what discolors, not the teeth. Film is the basis of tartar. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

These five effects twice daily

Pepsodent combats the film in two effective ways. It leaves teeth highly polished, so film less easily adheres.

It also multiplies the salivary flow. That is Nature's great tooth-protecting agent. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits that cling. It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is Nature's neutralizer of acids which cause decay.

Every application brings these five desired effects. All of them are deemed essential. But old methods never brought them.

Failed to end it

Old teeth cleaning methods have failed to end film. Much was left to night and day threaten serious damage. That's why well-brushed teeth discolored and decayed.

Dental science has for years sought ways to fight that film. Two effective methods have been found, and able authorities have well proved their efficiency.

Now those methods are combined in a dentifrice called Pepsodent—a tooth paste based on modern dental knowledge. And to millions of people it has brought a new era in teeth cleaning.

Send the coupon for a 10-day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

In a week the results will surprise and delight you. And your home, we believe, will adopt this new method. Don't wait longer. Cut out the coupon now.

The Flower of Good

It Will Grow if You Give It a Bit of a Chance

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

I DON'T often go mountain climbing. Because I don't often go where mountains are. But last week I spent three wonderful days in the country—far away from the skyscrapers, and the dust and the hurry of New York. And on one of those wonderful days I went, with the Nicest Man, on a walk that led down the side of one mountain and up the side of another—a walk that wound cautiously around steep places, and hurried over level stretches of woodland.

The level stretches of woodland, however, were rather few and far between. For that section of the country was a rocky one—it showed on every side the influence of the great glacier that swept, centuries ago, across a part of our continent. It was a country of high cliffs, and sheer precipices and great boulders. It was a country of curiously formed ledges and worn granite surfaces. The trees that grew, even in the forest land were, for the most part, pine and fir and a species of hemlock; the shrubs that lined the mountain paths were of a hardy variety. And the flowers that bloomed here and there among the shrubs were stunted flowers with stocky, upstanding stems. And, in the rockiest places, in the spots where we walked across wide ledges, there was hardly any vegetation.

Scarcely any leaves showed, or flowers, upon these ledges of rock. Indeed at first glance, one would have been apt to describe them as utterly barren. And yet, when one paused to look, there were many signs of plant life to be seen. For the rock, centuries old, had split in a number of places. And in those split places—in the wee crevices that breaks had made—grew brave flowers and tiny blades of grass. They had taken root, gallantly, in a few grains of sand. And—struggling eternally for the barest existence—they were springing up toward the sunshine and the light.

THE Nicest Man and I stooped down, there on the rocky ledge, to examine the grass and the flowers. They were so unexpected—so delightfully out of place! We noticed, first, that they were even more stunted than the flowers beside the path had been—that their colors were not very vivid and that their petals were transparent and frail. And yet their stems, too, were sturdy and upstanding. And the roots of them, almost devoid of nourishment or earthy covering, clung with a splendid tenacity to the solid rock. There was something pathetic—and unbelievably gallant—in the way that they clung. There was something almost breath-taking in their refusal to admit defeat!

"It just shows," I said softly to the Nicest Man, "how much they really want to grow—to make good. It would be so easy for a flower to give up and die—in a rock crevice. It isn't like having a whole garden to grow in, or a window box, or even a clay jar! They aren't being helped by fate or circumstance or destiny. They're growing despite every adverse condition!"

The Nicest Man smiled at my vehemence. He usually does.

"Give a flower a chance to grow," he told me sagely, "and it'll grow—even if the chance is an exceedingly small one! Flowers are like all other good and beautiful and worth-while things. Give 'em a chance—and they'll grow!"

It is that way with all good things—they'll grow if you give them the merest thread of a chance! They'll flourish in the rockiest sort of a place with scarcely a bit of nourishment. They'll cling to the sheerest cliff-side, and show blossoms across the surface of a gaunt rock.

Perhaps they're ideals, these good things! Perhaps it's into a stern and unyielding heart that their seeds have fallen. Perhaps they're ambitions that have happened, by chance, to fall upon a slothful nature. Perhaps they're dreams that have become lodged in an unimaginative mind. Perhaps they are hopes that have found a crevice in a bruised and beaten soul. But no matter what they are, these good things, they'll grow—if you give them the ghost of a show!

I KNEW a man once who was supposed to be very wicked. He had been so judged by the people and the courts—he had spent years in reformatories and jails and penitentiaries. He admitted freely that he was bad, he seemed to take a certain pride in his utter lawlessness.

No one believed that this man had a particle of good in him. Even the man thought himself to be a hopeless, and helpless, criminal. But there was a flower of something worth-while growing upon the rocky ledge of his nature. And a certain other man—who worked among unfortunates—saw it and recognized it.

This other man was not a minister or an evangelist or a great leader. He was simply a human being who believed in brotherhood and faith and trust. He was just a human being who wanted to make flowers grow upon barren surfaces. And so he took the wicked man in hand, and gained his friendship. And—for the first time—he gave the flower of good, in the wicked man's soul, a chance to grow.

The story of that growth is not a short one. But it can be outlined briefly—in a very few words. Being given a chance it flourished, and the wicked man began to mend his ways. He was no longer a menace to society, no longer a public charge. He found self-respect and self-pride. He found self-confidence, too. And—most important of all—he found God. Today he is a splendid worker, among other wicked men, in one of our great cities. Today he is searching for the stray, brave flowers that refuse to be beaten—that refuse, gallantly—to admit defeat!

Oh, friends of mine, look for the flowers that grow in the rocky places of life. You'll find them, if you look, growing in the open—for all the world to see. It's the barren ground that they grow upon that makes people, sometimes, pass them by! For they're often quite unexpected.

And yet—when you come to that—it's their absolute unexpectedness that makes them seem even more worth-while. The flower that grows in a beautiful sun-kissed meadow or in a charming old-fashioned garden is in a splendidly appropriate setting—its beauty is a beauty that you can not help taking more or less for granted.

But the flower that grows on a ledge of rock, the flower that lives in a crevice, can never be taken for granted. Its bravery—its struggle—must be recognized.

And, friends of mine, if there are some rocky places in your natures—we all of us have our rocky places—don't ignore the flowers that are trying to find a spot to cling to. Give them a chance—just a little chance—to grow. For a little chance is all that they need!

A FLOWER grew in the rocky soil,
Of a heart that was hard and cold;
And it bore on a tiny, stunted stalk,
A flower of purest gold.
And some folk wondered how it had come,
To bloom in that barren place;
And some folk paused, in their journeyings,
To gaze on its golden face.

The flower clung to the hardened heart,
And it raised its face to the sky,
And it gave a message of hope and cheer,
To many a passer-by!
And the heart seemed gay, because of it,
And warmer, and softer, too—
And, after a while, folk spoke of it,
As the heart where a flower grew!

Free Circulars for Investors

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address, on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 90 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2, describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices. Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To Invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co., 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent., are described in Circular 28.

Deere & Co., 10 year gold notes to yield 8.40%. Business farm implements. Founded by John Deere in 1837. Ask for circular No. 51.

Circular No. 50 gives complete information on Federal Farm Loan Bonds. They pay 7 1/2% and are tax exempt. Farm Mortgages—details also circulars regarding 6 per cent. First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Send for Circular 38.

Foreign Bonds—opportunities for obtaining Foreign Municipal Bonds with yearly drawings at par giving high average yield of 12 1/2 per cent.—Danish Internal Loans, Norwegian and Scandinavian Bonds. Booklet 48.

Bonds—questions answered, terms defined. A very valuable non-technical booklet that every prospective bond buyer should have. No. 42.

Selecting Your Investments, Strong Box Investments, Creating Good Investments, are three booklets describing the service and safe, high yield investments of a nationally known investment house. No. 43.

Articles made at Daily Vacation Bible School of the People's Church, East Lansing, Mich.

"Train Up a Child—"

THE average Protestant child receives thirteen hours of instruction a year in the average Sunday school, according to the survey figures of the Interchurch World Movement. Over against this are the Roman Catholic figures of two hundred and sixteen hours for each child a year, and Jewish figures of three hundred and twenty-six hours. This is a fearful discrepancy, and Protestantism, we hope, will be awake to it. A half-way house toward a better order of things is the Daily Vacation Bible School. For five or six weeks the children gather each morning from nine till half-past eleven o'clock, and receive instruction in the Bible, in the standard hymns of the church, and in handcraft work. The latter includes basketmaking and hammock-making for the boys, and various varieties and degrees of sewing for the girls.

The town in which the writer is a pastor is a college town. It is also a one-church town, so that the one church is the church. This is not accident, nor an evidence of spiritual deadness, but is the result of careful planning on the part of the "fathers." These good men determined if possible to organize a church in such a way as to make its work and worship so comprehensive that no other church would ever be organized until the town grew so large as to demand one. The plan is still working.

This made the program of the Daily Vacation Bible School very feasible. But any town or city with several churches or many can conduct a Vacation Bible School. In fact the experiment now under discussion was an experiment where ten churches were enlisted. The writer's church was the tenth to enter the plan, as the town of East Lansing is three miles from Lansing, where the other nine churches are situated.

NO ONE knew how the Daily Vacation Bible School would take. No resident had ever conducted one, or even worked in one. But there is always a first time. The school was thoroughly advertised. Every family received a letter from the pastor and superintendent inviting all children to attend whether they were Sunday school attendants or not. Three teachers were engaged to supervise the work, and a corps of volunteers was solicited. The volunteers made the success of the school possible. On no day was the superintendent embarrassed for want of helpers.

And the children came. They came until the classes became too large, and the superintendent besought the pastor not to advertise any more, lest they be swamped with children. Fifty or so had been expected. After the first day the attendance was never less than one hundred and thirty.

The man who told the daily Bible story covered the chief characters of the Bible. He said it was exhilarating work. There were thrills in it. A man does not have to go over Niagara in a barrel, or go up in a biplane for thrills. He could find them at the church. To talk about some Bible character while scores of young eyes are fastened on the speaker drafts the best of brain and heart.

A One-Church Town Utilizes the Daily Vacation Bible School

By N. A. McCUNE

Each morning during the opening service, there was the salute to the Stars and Stripes, followed by "The Star Spangled Banner." This develops patriotism. Then came the salute to the Christian flag, followed by one of the great hymns of the church. This teaches reverence.

As for the work in handcraft, the enthusiasm was so great that the children were always displeased when it was omitted and games were substituted. Boys took home the baskets they were making. Girls threaded their needles each day at the closing hour, so that there might be no delay in getting to work the next day.

PARENTS were hearty supporters of the Daily Vacation Bible School. It was worth something to know where their children were each morning, for two hours and a half. Homes where Bible stories had been told, and where the Bible is an open book, were made glad by having these stories retold in what was perhaps a new way. And the children who never had heard them before were led out into a different mental world. The whole town became interested in the movement. The local weekly newspaper demanded repeated "write-ups" of what was going on. The school reached the children of not a few families who hitherto had not been church folk. The follow-up work with these is another chapter.

At the close of the session of five weeks, an exhibit was held. Visitors were astonished at the workmanship of these boys and girls. And the demonstration that was given in Bible memory work, and in singing without the book was very much worth while.

This is an experiment that any church may well enter. If the Sunday school is in a languishing state, the Daily Vacation Bible School will purge away its languor. If the school is strong and well officered, so much greater the chances of success. Instead of summer being a period of dearth, deadness and despair, it may become a time of life learning and leadership.

CENTRAL Presbyterian Church of Denton, Texas, of which Rev. A. R. Copeland is pastor, has developed a method of Gospel propaganda which might well be copied elsewhere. It is the placing of literature bags in schools, public offices, shops, railway stations and other places, each bag having thirty pockets filled with the best tracts obtainable. The pastor has found that all classes read these tracts and that they constitute a most effective and economical form of evangelism. In the church vestibule are book tables; on one all books are free and are paid for by contributions from those interested, and on two others the price of each book is marked on the cover and the purchaser leaves the money in the plate.

Questions and Answers

C. H. P., North Bangor, N. Y., writes: "Having read your articles on Disarmament, and trusting that Christians will unite in prayer to this end, I write to say that there are yet some questions in my mind. Will God bless the coming Conference if He is not asked to do so? This I think will be done; but to do so, will He not require that the nations humble themselves and confess their sins? And, as the Bible says: 'There shall be wars in the last days,' so there certainly will be wars."

We believe that in churches and other gatherings, and in countless homes throughout the land, prayers will be offered that God will direct the deliberations of the Conference. They are even now being offered. We have strong faith that the Christian spirit will find expression in the Conference, although many religions may be represented.

Reader, Greencastle, Pa. There is nothing to prevent any church, whatever its creed or affiliation, from joining in the Disarmament resolutions. The issues involved appeal to all alike. With regard to the recognition of God in the work of the coming Conference, we believe there will be a powerful and effective sentiment in its favor.

A. R. H., Greensboro, N. C., writes: "When I was a child, a church was considered a holy place. When persons would come in, they would go carefully to their pew and sit down, or would kneel reverently in prayer for a few moments, and then take a seat, never uttering a word to any one, except in extreme cases, before services commenced, and then only in the softest whisper. Now it seems that there is a decided change. It is not uncommon to see whispering in the rear of churches in the midst of services, and when 'Let us pray' is given out by the minister, very few even bend forward. In fact, a great many churches are not built for kneeling, and it is seldom that the minister calls on the congregation to stand. In the choirs of long ago no operatic music was indulged in; whereas now you seldom hear anything else. Oftentimes persons singing in the choirs are not of a religious disposition at all; and to hear the yells and sounds that are produced in rendering the operatic notes by the modern choirs is certainly very foreign to our humble attitude, when we come to confess our sins to God and ask his forgiveness."

Our reader is somewhat excessive in his observations on the modern church service. However, he states several things that many must have remarked regretfully as he does. The attitude of reverence is missing in some churches, but in the majority it is still preserved. We would be glad to hear expressions from other readers on the subject.

Inquirer, Logan, W. Va. We have submitted your inquiry for statistics on Jewish Christian Churches to Rev. Leopold Cohn of the Williamsburg Mission to the Jews, whom we regard as specially well-informed on the subject. He writes: "I am not aware of the existence of any Christian Churches in Jerusalem beyond the establishments of the Greek Catholics, the Roman Catholics, and the existence of several missionary enterprises among the Jews here. For a long time past the London Society for promoting the Gospel among the Jews, through the Anglican Church, has maintained a mission station in Jerusalem, and for many years the Anglican Church was represented there by Bishop Blyth. The Christian and Missionary Alliance of New York also maintains a mission station in Jerusalem, which I understand they call the American Church. Whether or not it has a definite membership of Christians, I do not know. There are at the present time in all of Palestine some 700,000 people; of this number four-fifths are Mohammedans; 76,000 are Jews; and 64,000 are Christians; by the term Christian here is meant all forms of Catholicism as well as Protestantism. As regards the number of converted Jews now living in the United States who are members of Christian Churches, it is impossible to give any accurate information. When a Jew is converted, he usually joins some Christian Church in the district where he is located and for the purposes of racial distinction he is lost and no more classed as a Jew, but is included in the general list of church membership in the regular churches. The late Louis Meyer who had spent much time gathering statistics along these lines estimated at one time that there must be fully 10,000 Jews in this country alone who are members of Christian Churches. We have organized in our own Mission what might be called a Jewish Christian Church, known as the Sar Shalom Association, properly incorporated and consisting in the main of Jewish Christians, most of them having been converted and baptized here. This church is not intended to take the place of the regular Christian churches, for we encourage all of our converts to join wherever possible Christian churches of whatever denomination best appeals to them."

Beautiful New Designs—

Here we can offer only the merest glimpse of a few of the beautiful new Congoleum Rug patterns. For to fully appreciate their artistry of design and coloring you must go to your dealer and see the rugs themselves.

Patterns for Every Room

There you will find designs to grace any room in the house—colors that will blend harmoniously with any scheme of decoration. And all in floor-coverings that possess that delightful practicality so dear to the heart of the American housewife.

So Easily Cleaned

The rare beauty of Congoleum Art-Rugs is more than "skin deep." Remarkably durable, the bright colors are fade-proof; the smooth, waterproof surface will not absorb grease. Just a light going-over with a damp mop keeps the surface sanitary—clean as a new pin.

Nor is it any trouble to lay Congoleum—it lies flat on the floor without fastening of any kind.

This beauty, which you would expect only in expensive woven rugs, and this durability are obtainable at prices that are amazingly low.

Popular Sizes—Popular Prices

The Everyday Mission of the Church

PLAY—and here we use the word as referring to organized sports and athletic games as distinguished from the quiet and social game—is the greatest character-building force in existence. "So great," in the words of a youthful Illinois parson, "that the unused church basement is a criminal offense against the youth of the neighborhood in which it exists."

This parson knew whereof he spoke. The church to which he had been called was one of the best buildings in the settlement, which had neither pool rooms nor movie shows and which offered, in fact, nothing for the young people to do after the sun went down but lean against lamp posts and plan "devilment." It offered little more before sundown. The church, modern in architecture, had a splendid basement with a series of large and small rooms, and the parson was not satisfied to see them used only the three or four times a year that a church supper was given. He began to visualize the sort of social clubs that would take the boys off the streets and give them something to do every day. He began to study sporting goods catalogues and games. He put the matter before his board. But game tables such as were required, and such as the Y. M. C. A. in the nearby town used, cost from $35 to $75, and the board would have none of such extravagance, furthermore, they would not have the basement cluttered up so that the ladies could not hold their suppers. The whole notion was preposterous!

But this minister is persistent. He is also versatile, and he is modern, being thoroughly imbued with the idea that communal effort can accomplish anything. He took some of the young men into his confidence. He went to the Y. M. C. A. in the nearby town and made studies and drawings of the tables. He figured out designs for tables with legs that would fold up when not in use. He called on millwrights and lumbermen. Then he went back to see the board.

When the work started, some of the board hunted up the household hammers and saws and came to help. In a few weeks, the Social Center was opened. An odd pin table stood at one end of the basement, with a table for quiboulette beside it. There was a shuffleboard at the other. A box-ball alley, which had been offered at a sacrifice price while the work was in progress, and purchased by the board, held place of honor, with a score board which the dominie had invented decorating the side wall! And the whole cost was only $60.

The boys have stopped post-leaning. They don't have time to plan devilment. They are too busy playing matched games. The older men come and go at will, day or night, the repository for the door-key being an open village secret. Once a week the women and girls play, and just now the alley is noisy all day long with practice for the big tournament which is scheduled.

"But the minister is not through," it is said. "His vision has got out of the basement. That was only the starting point, it seems. He sees tennis courts and outdoor paraphernalia for all sorts of play in the lot behind the church. He sees a new sort of churchyard. Give him time and the co-operation of the people, and his vision will become a reality."

OTH<sup>ER</sup> ministers, having adopted a policy of "play as a direct educational value, moral and religious as well as mental and physical," have started in their own church basement or in their own vacant church lots, presently to find themselves co-operating with playground and park commissions, schools and municipalities in meeting the recreational demands of the whole people. They have found themselves taking the initiative in presenting the play rights of the whole people.

There are more than a hundred playgrounds in the country being operated directly by churches. It would be difficult to estimate the number of church basement "gyms" in existence. There are so many, however, that it seems safe to predict that the church of tomorrow will have its physical recreation department almost as infallibly as the school of today has.

The question of leadership seems troublesome at first. The school physical director, if there be one, will be found willing to co-operate, at least in starting the work. The local community service athletic director, or the Y. M. C. A. athletic supervisor will likewise assist. Leadership is often forthcoming from unsuspected sources. When the Calvary Church program was planned at Buffalo, a Catholic resident of the neighborhood volunteered to take charge of this part of the program, and has worked tirelessly in the cause, developing athletics for men and boys on a very large scale.

But one of the greatest sources of leadership, after the initial work is done, will prove to be within the church itself. In Bay City, Mich., where training classes have been held by the Community Council for developing playground leadership, many church people have interested themselves in the subject. This has been true elsewhere where the Michigan State Community Commission has held its institutes for the training of play leaders and athletic directors. In one town where the younger children had nothing to do during the summer, a volunteer group of mothers went to a nearby town and took a course in playground leadership in order to organize recreation and keep them off the streets.

The problem of equipment is not a difficult one. There may not be within the community a man so versatile as the minister mentioned heretofore. However, the big assembly room, with window and floor adequately protected, may be turned into a "gym" for people of all ages almost without expense. The little Wonder Kit (provided by Community Service at actual cost) is a compact chest, with hinged lid and a lock containing full equipment for baseball, basketball, volley ball, quoits, and medicine ball. The Playground and Recreation Association of America also furnished adequate information for the manufacture of outdoor play paraphernalia.

This organization provides, too, athletic badge tests which the amateur leader, especially, will find of value in arousing the spirit of team play and competitive effort. The Russell Sage Foundation, 130 East 22nd Street, New York, provides a similar set of tests for boys and girls. These tests are graded according to age and weight.

GREAT stress should be put upon sportsmanship in all games for boys and girls. By sportsmanship is meant the conduct of the participant during the games. Use of profane language, unsportsmanlike crowding, shoving, elbowing, crossing in front, or any other unfair tactics should disqualify a player. Reliability should be considered in scoring, that is, the promptness with which a player takes his place at the game and with which he follows the leader's instructions.

In Palatka, interest in church play has been widespread since the organization was started. There are now three leagues of church teams, representing boys from 10 to 13; 14 to 17; and adults. Each team plays at least once a week during the year, the boys being scheduled to play twice a week during the school year. A similar series of leagues has been organized in Bay City, Mich., and one is in process of being formed in Buffalo. But in Wilmington, Del., forty-seven Protestant churches have united in forming a city-wide Recreation League "to stimulate athletics and play among their membership of both sexes and all ages!" The management of the League is vested in a board of managers consisting of one representative from each church appointed by the pastor. Anyone over ten years old who is a member of some organization of some church may belong, but members must be vouched for by their minister or Sunday-school superintendent, before he or she can compete in any of the recreation held under the auspices of the League.

Under the League basket ball, bowling, quoits, and checker tournaments have been organized, as well as tennis, baseball and swimming. Last year 1,073 games of quoits alone were played, 910 in the Senior, 150 in the Junior League with 13 in the champion series. Inspired by the achievements of the Protestant League, a Catholic League has been formed and already enlists 15 churches.

The three Marys on their way to the Tomb of Christ, as portrayed in a pageant by members of the Union M. E. Church in New York City

"You think it sounds foolish for men of our ages to get so excited over the game," a gray-haired church member recently exclaimed, after a hard-fought tennis match, "but I am convinced that all of us fellows are having opportunities we never had before to practice our Christianity, to develop it as we develop our muscles right here on this court!" And after all that is a pretty fair argument for the case of church play.

MANY churches over the country have their own dramatics organizations which both study the principles underlying the best drama and produce plays as a part of the social center recreation. Such wide-spread service has been rendered for all such groups by the Drama League, the Missionary Education movement and other agencies that it is not worth while to enter here into sources of information or suitable material for production. Of late, however, many churches have turned their attention to the dramatic presentation of scenes and stories from the Bible, and have done so with such profound religious effect as to challenge the attention of the country.

When the Union Methodist Church of New York City called upon the Community Service to establish a dramatic department in its Social Center, the work, it was stated, would have a two-fold purpose: To develop the latent ability for self-expression upon the part of the young people; and to make more vivid through the use of the drama, the message of the church. To further the second end, a course in Biblical drama, was launched for church workers. Specific themes studied and adapted for presentation by Sunday schools or to form a part of Sunday evening services, varied in length from a fifteen minutes presentation to an entire evening's performance.

The first performance to be given in the church was on Easter Sunday evening. The play, "The Resurrection of Our Lord," was a fragmentary medieval miracle play. A crowded house sat in hushed awe while, to the music of the immortal oratorios so closely associated in our minds with the scenes, Pilate brooded over having condemned Jesus Christ, the Marys lamented at the empty Tomb, and finally the Angel of the Lord appeared in a burst of radiance to the organ music of Handel's "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth."

The effect was profound! The idea of the dramatized service was new to many of the audience. Still it is an old, old idea. As long ago as 1905, mystery plays were being presented in St. Agnes Episcopal Chapel of New York as a means of Biblical instruction to catechism classes. And in 1911, the Board of Home Missions created an educational department with a section devoted to dramatic production within the church. In at least one state—Ohio—both the Episcopal and the Methodist churches have over a period of eight years been sporadically promoting Biblical dramatic productions.

THAT the theater, or anything suggestive of a "show" is the direct instrument of the devil, is an idea that dies hard—an idea that did not arise without reason during the Middle Ages. But we have only to go back far enough in religious history to find that dramatic expression first arose through a strong sense of the divine in the human soul.

No more than two centuries after Christ, it was customary for persons representing Abraham, Moses and Sapphira to appear on an improvised platform in the church, and to hold intimate converse with God in the Burning Bush. The Good Friday and Easter processions and the Procession of the Searchers for the Body followed soon thereafter as a reverent means of celebrating the great Christian holy day. Is it not somewhat natural that after the lapse of so many centuries we should turn again to so fit a vehicle of expression for the greatest and strongest emotions of the human soul? Is it strange that with the coming of the socialized church we should turn to the dignity and beauty of this means of social religious expression?

Recently, in Worcester, Mass., the Union Church presented a beautiful spectacle pageant, "In the Days of the Judges," arranged and produced by local church people. It is said that the people of that city learned more of the historical continuity of the Old Testament than they had ever known before. The deeply religious atmosphere of the play was sustained throughout by the accompanying soft music, and by the costumes and settings which were modeled after those in the world's most famous Biblical paintings, which had been studied by a special committee over a period of several months.

The churches of the South Side in Wabash, Ind., combined in holding their Pilgrim's Tercentenary celebration, which took the form of a pageant of the First Religious Observances of Our Forefathers.

THIS is the last of a series by Mrs. Candler on "The Everyday Mission of the Church" that we believe will influence strongly the work being done by wide-awake churches in hundreds of communities. There has been little of theory in the articles but plenty of fact and illustration of what other towns have done and are doing, together with a summary of some of the results. Why not look up the other articles in the series and read them now as a whole?

Several of the leading churches of Washington have for a number of years held Christmas Nativity plays which were enacted in the chancel. And these are but instances of local effort producing conspicuous results.

MEANWHILE, a general recognition of the value of religious dramatics and pageantry on the part of national religious organizations has led first to the formation of National Commissions on Religious mental purpose of our undertaking may be shocked," said one minister whose church was about to present the dramatized ritual. But the significant thing there as elsewhere was that those who came half expecting to be shocked, went away profoundly moved. A few years ago, a dramatics director, sent out by the State Diocese of the Episcopal Church, went to a small town to give a course of training in religious dramatics to the children of the local church.

It was her intention to produce the dramas in the chancel as she had done elsewhere. The minister mildly but firmly protested and the high-school stage, which was in reality only a platform, as badly arranged as most school stages, had to be used instead. The performance was held on a Friday evening and after it was over the minister came to the director and urged her to cancel engagements in other parts of the state and repeat the program in the church on Sunday morning in place of the regular 11 o'clock service. "I had no idea of the value of your work or of religious drama," he explained. And that is the general attitude.

It is not possible in the limited scope of this brief article to outline programs; its purpose has been merely to suggest the vast possibilities all along the line of social endeavor, awaiting the awakened church, together with some sources of information as to paths toward their realization. "When you are doing all these things," says one minister, "you are creating a love of country, a contentment to live in it, an intelligent joy in its inimitable fascinations and wonders—all of which are akin to the worship for which your church structure was designed." And you are creating, incidentally, that ideal state in which all become true Members of one Body—that Body the Living Church.

Being "wheelbarrowed" into Sunday school via the church gymnasium

Dramatics by a number of the Protestant churches, including the Methodist, the Baptist and the Episcopal. It has led to the formation of a Dramatics Association of the Sunday schools of New York, and a similar one in New Jersey. And only recently a Council on Church Drama and Pageantry has been organized under the General Board of Religious Education. This council will, as speedily as possible, bring together all available material suitable for church production. It will act as a clearing house for information and assistance to the churches of the country. It is composed of representatives of the Dramatics and Pageantry departments or educational departments of all Protestant churches, and of dramatics experts of the Y. W. C. A., the Community Service, and other social organizations.

One of the greatest things it will attempt to do is to stimulate the celebration of the great church holy days by the production of suitable pageants. Ultimately it will aim to circulate especially arranged material for such production, and wherever wanted, furnish directors to assist in the preliminary arrangements, and take charge of costuming, lighting and scenery.

Meanwhile the church which has its musical and dramatics talent, or which has adequate leadership may turn its attention to the dramatization of Biblical themes. "We hope," says Mrs. Donald Pratt, executive of the National Episcopal Commission on Biblical Dramatics and Pageantry, "that the time will soon come when every church basement in the country will be a workshop where groups of children as well as adults are busy on costumes, on 'properties,' on all that goes toward the production of the visualized Sunday-school lesson. "Nothing is so real to the child, to the youth—to any of us, in fact, as those things which we act out, and it seems safe to presume that the everyday application of the great moral lessons of the Old and the New Testament will be immensely strengthened."

By LAURA R. WILKIE

HERE and there they began to come back to the country last winter, when the industrial depression first made itself felt—the Down-and-Outs. They awakened little sympathy, because, said Up-and-Going, "Let them suffer a bit. Labor has been having things its own way for a long while. Now it's Capital's turn."

Capital is still sitting on the lid of industry, perhaps to make sure that the lesson will soak in, and the army of the unemployed has turned, on its fringes, to an army, ever growing, of Down-and-Outs, while occasionally there is developing the genuine old-time hobo, from which the country was rid for a number of years.

Make a tour of the New York city parks, stand and watch the "hand-out" lines of those who, having patiently sat through an hour or more of religious appeal at the various missions, now reap the practical reward—a tin cup of coffee, and a hunk of bread, possibly somewhat over an inch in thickness.

Go first to the Bowery Mission, 227 Bowery, because it is recognized to be a "barometer of industrial conditions." Think that term over, for it implies much, and all that it implies is a fact. The superintendent, John G. Hallimond, and his wife are in Europe on business, so we must pick up such information as we can from the volunteer workers about the mission, those who ask only that they may give, and who are actuated by no desire to swell the mission's funds through your donations, although, heaven knows, they would be glad if you should contribute, because they know very well that it would mean more meal tickets and more lodging tickets to give out to the men who throng the doors.

HERE is John G. Goode, one of the lecturers, or, in other words, one of a considerable number of men who are attached to the mission in a quasi-official capacity, to "give testimony" as to their salvation.

Mr. Goode is an ex-convict, redeemed from drunkenness and "all that went with it," as he expresses it, twelve years ago, at the age of forty-seven.

He pleads with the men to accept the soul's salvation which religion offers to them, tells them how he was saved, and never once strikes a maudlin note. No one but a real man could do that, and the men listen to all that he has to say with respect for the speaker as well as for the message. He asks if there are men who want special prayers—if they do, to hold up their hands or to stand right up and say what is their special need or needs. Hands go up soatteringly, and a few men rise and murmur their personal requests.

One man wants prayers for his "quick temper," another for "not having been the man I ought to be these past few days," and still another "for everybody who hasn't a bed—and for those who are suffering in Ireland."

And then, a ruddy-cheeked young fellow rises awkwardly to his feet and stammers out, "Please pray that us fellows get some work to do."

Lecturer Goode, ex-convict, graduate from a reformatory, with a post-graduate course to his credit in Sing Sing, a "saved" man—and if there be any better servant than he in humanity's cause, I for one never have met him—pauses, swallows hard, gets back his hold on himself, and replies: "Yes, brother, that's the ticket. We'll all join in prayer for enough jobs to go around. We can ask that with a good grace, too, for God surely meant that every man should have work."

THERE are a few in the gathering before him who are obviously permanent non-assets to the industrial community, so broken down are they from dissipation or ill-health—and it must never be forgotten that ill-health can batter down the walls of fitness just as easily and as quickly as dissipation, so that it is not just to assume that all the derelicts on the Bowery (or elsewhere) have foundered on the sand-bars of self-indulgence.

Suppose an honest workman has a spell of pneumonia, is sent from his hall room to the free ward in the city hospital by his landlady, comes out with low resistance and an occasional cough, no job, and no money left. Where does he drift—where, indeed, can he drift—except to the missions that dole out bread and coffee to the limit of their slender resources?

But—and I am taking it for granted, now, that you are with me on the platform of the Bowery Mission re-living with me the experience of Sunday night a week ago—there happens to be a very young face in the gathering, which because of its youthfulness and its dark eyes and the shadows beneath them, attracts the attention. This, as I said, is Sunday night.

After the service, Mr. Goode, in response to inquiries, suggests that we go down in the basement toward the front of the building, where the hand-out line is forming. They don't call it a bread line, for the simple reason that it is really not open to the public from the street. One attends the services, first, in order to "qualify" as a guest.

There is the same youth here, getting his tin cup of coffee and his hunk of bread. Also there is a soldier in his khaki uniform, shrunk and too tight a fit for his muscular body. Perhaps he spent his army wages thoughtlessly, taking it for granted that he could find employment soon—and then, to his surprise, found himself caught in the baffling and inexorable web of industrial inactivity.

LAST Sunday night it poured down rain, when we left the Mission, after all the men had had their bread and coffee—257 in all, by actual count of the used tin cups. They were ranged outside, standing as close to the building as they could get, waiting for the storm to abate somewhat so that they could make a dive for some sorry shelter or other before they were drenched through to their skins. The city parks, where they sleep on other nights, is impossible tonight. There remains the Municipal Lodging House, the "All Night" Mission on the lower Bowery, where one may bunk on the benches if entrance is made by midnight, similar accommodations at the Doyer Street Mission in Chinatown, and the hallways, the sheds and the docks.

For seamen there is free lodging at the Seamen's Church Institute, where 714 get beds every night.

And after the beds give out there are the hard maple floors until they, also, can accommodate no more. But that is in the vicinity of the Battery—a long way off, a night like this. And further away, over in South Brooklyn, there is a little Norwegian church which gives free lodgings and free meals, and the Bethel Branch of the Y. M. C. A. Seamen's Institute and Home two blocks away from the church.

The Municipal Lodging House, however, will give shelter only five nights in a month.

The problem is too much. We come home, careless of the pouring rain, because unlike the Lined up in the Bowery Mission basement for a serving of bread and coffee. This is only a small part of the line, for hundreds are served each night

CHAPTER XIV

"I CANNOT imagine what ever induced that lovely woman, Mrs. King, to marry that boor! I had nearly said 'brute,' and the term is none too strong for him."

The Hailes were on the way home from a dinner-party at the Ford's, given in honor of the host's birthday. He had, as was his wont upon similar occasions, sent his limousine to bring them to his house, and it was now taking them back.

Stuart did not seem to heed the criticism for a moment, and the wife hastened to deprecate rebuke for her intemperate outburst:

"Those were not pretty words to apply to a fellow-guest, I know, but you were not so unlucky as to sit next to him for an hour-and-a-half. Mrs. Ford—for my sins, I suppose—selected him to take me in to dinner, as you saw. Doubtless the poor lady thought that the proper thing to do was to send Mrs. King in with my husband. A sort of 'turn-about-is-fair-play' arrangement. I saw that you were well entertained, and was glad of it, although I was alternately bored and provoked.

"The—the creature opened the ball by asking me if I knew that the man who had taken Mrs. Ford in was 'many times a multi-millionaire!' He told me the name, but I didn't burden my memory with it. Then he went into particulars of Mr. Ford's monetary adventures—all of them successes. 'Lucky dog!' he said approvingly. 'Everything he touches turns to gold, like the chap we used to read about at school. What was his name?' 'You mean Midas,' said I coolly. 'That's the chap. You and my wife have a way of recollecting such things. She's very literary, you know. I told her today that she reminded me of a fellow somebody was talking of at the Club last night, who could hold his tongue in ten different languages. She was gabbling French with her maid at such a rate that I ripped out that I wished to heaven she could hold her tongue in two! I don't care a sou markee—whatever that may be—for the books she and her visitors talk about. And I care less for music.'

"He had to stop to take breath, and it was my turn to say something. 'That is a pity,' I replied to his last remark. 'You miss a great deal for Mrs. King plays exquisitely.' I fancied that was rather neat. Men like to hear their wives praised—not only because they belong to themselves—as part of their personal belongings.

"So I'm told, until between you and I, I'm sick to death of hearing it. When I come home and hear that darned music-box of a grand piano on the rampage, I turn on my heel and make for the Club, or for some other hole and corner where a fellow who has had his nose at the grindstone all day long, trying to make a decent living for his family, can eat a meal in peace. I beg your pardon, dear!" as Stuart put up a protesting hand. "It's too bad to repeat such stuff. But nothing to the misery of getting it, and as much more and worse if possible poured into one's ears when escape is as impracticable as if one were chained to her chair. Which brings me back to the proposition: 'Why did such a woman marry such a man?'"

"I suspect from certain bits of gossip that have floated to me that the match was made by the two high contracting powers, her mother and his," was his reply. "She was young, and I dare say ambitious; her father had died comparatively poor, and she had been brought up in affluence and had every conceivable advantage of education. King was rich and on the way to amass greater wealth. He fell desperately in love with the girl his mother picked out for him. Her own mother was very delicate, and begged her child to provide a home for her declining days—but the whole thing is too abhorrent to be thought over, much less discussed. She is a martyr who bears her cross like the Christian she is. Her behavior to the boor who owns her is beyond praise. Heaven help her!"

"I wish we could help her!" ejaculated the wife earnestly. "She asked me this evening if she might run in to see me informally at odd hours when I could find time to talk quietly with her. I said 'Yes, of course,' heartily."

Thus ensconced in a straight-backed armchair that fitted her easily, she entered upon the matter that engaged her poetic mind

"Like the true woman you are!" His hand sought hers under the fur robe. "Heaven bless you for always longing to bring comfort to the comfortless!"

THUS auspiciously began the intimacy between women who, living in different spheres, yet had so much in common as regards intellectual and artistic tastes, that the association was soon a delight to both and consolation to one who had never dared dream of what she gratefully termed her "wayside well of refreshment."

Their interviews were so cleverly timed, in accordance with Mrs. King's notion, that few outside of the Parsonage guessed that Mrs. Haile's second story sitting-room was brightened by tri-weekly calls from the millionaire's wife, and that the house was—as the hostess put it—"glorified" at these and other hours by the exquisite music the visitor drew from the piano in the lower room.

"I am going to betray my husband's confidence," Anita said gaily one rainy forenoon in December, after relieving the guest of her mufflings. "He had purposely stayed in his home study on several mornings when we knew that you were coming and left the study door ajar that he might hear you play. He says it is an inspiration to him. He writes more freely and happily while, as he puts it, 'the air vibrates with music that might come down from a celestial choir' than under any other circumstances. There! I know that sounds bombastic, but he didn't know you would ever hear of it. He is not to suspect that I have let you into the secret. But you have a right to learn what a mission yours is. And now that you are in the secret, you can play such selections as you know he likes best."

For one witching half-hour sonata followed nocturne, varied by dreamy improvisations that bespoke the moved soul of the translator. Anita hearkened, entranced and speechless, until the performer arose and closed the piano. Then she kissed her friend, with tears in her eyes.

"You have surpassed yourself today. I can say nothing except to thank you in my husband's name and my own."

"He craves the privilege of saying a word for himself!" said Stuart from the door.

HE SHOOK hands heartily with the musician, who blushed and smiled as a school-girl might under the flood of commendation to which this was the prelude.

"The privilege and the favor are mine," she slipped in at length. "I thought you would be at the Church House."

"As I should be, if I had not formed the habit of studying at home when I wish to be undisturbed by calls from outside. Mr. Miller is manager when I am absent from what has become an office rather than a study. That is one of the unlooked-for benefits of having the dual pastorate."

"Mrs. King's car is at the door!" announced the maid.

"Stay to luncheon, won't you?" pleaded the hostess. "Mr. King will hardly come uptown through the storm."

"He went to Chicago yesterday and will not be at home for a week," was the rejoinder. "And when he is in town he seldom comes home to luncheon. But I can not stay, thank you, dear! I'm a very busy woman just now."

Haile donned overcoat and hat and brought an umbrella from the hall-rack, in readiness to escort her to the limousine by the time she was cloaked and bonneted. The snow drove between them as he paused upon the threshold of the outer door to raise the umbrella. She closed the door behind them and stood on tiptoe to reach his ear:

"It is providential this finding you at home! For I am in sore trouble and I need your advice. When can you call? Come very soon, please!" The agitated accents struck him like a blow in the face. But he answered on the instant!

"This afternoon, if you wish. At four o'clock?" "Yes," as he led her down the steps. "And please not a word to her," nodding backward.

He put her into the car, shut the door upon her and went back to his study, the distressed "I must see you!" driving memories of the music from his mind.

CHAPTER XV

WITHIN a week after the severest snow-storm of the winter, Mrs. Haile had to explain the change in her husband's habits of study to another parishioner.

Miss Albertha Briggs was fond of narrating to those who remarked upon her uncommon name that it was a combination of her parents' pronomens—"Albert" and "Bertha." "You see my mother was disappointed that I was not a boy and my father was transported with delight that he had a daughter who might grow up to be as great a blessing to him as his wife had been, and they agreed to have me christened under the odd name. I hope neither of them was ever ashamed of it."

She also liked to mention casually that she had been called by word of mouth and twice at least in print—"The Poetess Laureate of the Banner Church." For she had been writing rhymes which some people persisted in calling "poetry" ever since she could hold a pen. She had written religious verse galore,

The Story in Brief

SILAS FORD, the dominant figure in the fashionable Banner Church in New York City, is profoundly impressed while on a visit to Marlinton, a few miles distant, by the preaching of Rev. Stuart Haile, whose ten-year pastorate there has been extraordinarily happy and successful. The leaders of the Banner Church have determined on the resignation of their pastor, Rev. Dr. Samuel Stenson, because they believe that at sixty-three he is too old for the best interests of a modern city church conducted with business-like efficiency, and Mr. Haile reluctantly accepts their call because of the larger opportunities for service. The Banner Church makes much of welcoming the Hailes and stages what its members call the "unique Demonstration" for the retiring and the incoming pastors. Mrs. Haile finds somewhat trying a lengthy call from Mrs. Wingate, who dominates the women's activities of the Church, and a call from Mrs. Wingate's satellite—Miss Maynard, the parish visitor—increases her repugnance to the courting of wealth and social position so evident in the congregation. The pastor insists on devoting much of his time and energies to the poor and needy of the parish, despite the opposition of the church's leaders, who wish him to cultivate those who will add to the social prestige of the church, and they engage an assistant pastor, Anselm Miller.

The Churches and Disarmament

Many Denominations Endorse the Memorial to President Harding

IN RESPONSE to the Christian Herald's appeal churches of every denomination, in all the States, continue to send in by every mail signed resolutions endorsing the program of the coming Conference on Disarmament, to be held in Washington, November 11th, and heartily approving of the action of President Harding in his efforts for world peace. They also urge that the work of the Conference should from beginning to end be characterized by the recognition of Divine Sovereignty and the teaching and spirit of Jesus Christ. We give, on this page another long list of these remarkable communications and they are still pouring in upon us.

It is important that as many churches as possible should lose no time in taking action on the Memorial, and send us the result promptly, in order that all may be included in the presentation when it is submitted to the President.

The list given below includes the following denominations: Baptist, Congregational, Methodist, Lutheran, United Evangelical, Primitive Methodist, United Brethren, Dutch Reformed, Friends, Presbyterian, Protestant Episcopal, United Presbyterian, Church of the Nazarene, Swedish Evangelical, Norwegian and Danish Methodist Episcopal, Mennonite, Advent Christian, Christian Church, Federated Churches and Union Churches; also a large number of evangelical churches and churches in the rural districts. ## Geneva and Washington

AFTER a full year of work, and some of it very excellent work in its way, the League of Nations Assembly in Geneva has at last given signs of recognition of the problem of world disarmament—or more properly speaking, of the general reduction of armament. One of the foremost champions of disarmament is Lord Robert Cecil, who on September 27, after a strenuous battle, forced through the Assembly Committee of the League a resolution calling for the preparation of general proposals for world disarmament. In the course of his argument Lord Cecil, who spoke as the representative of South Africa, urged that both Great Britain and France should show more activity in submitting their plans, as such delay obstructed the progress of the work undertaken by the League.

Early in the discussion, it became clear to Lord Cecil that he could not carry out his original proposition, which was to provide for a definite plan for general reduction of armaments throughout the world, to be presented to the Assembly next year. He learned that the legislative steamroller was held in readiness to crush such a project the moment it was made. An English delegate, opposing Cecil, rose in protest against what he described as "headlong steps" that might prove disastrous. There must first be "regional understandings" on disarmament before general disarmament could be made possible. A French delegate also pleaded for delay, and an Italian delegate, equally anxious, deprecated haste. And so the discussion sped, most of the speakers declaring that the original Cecil propositions to prepare a definite plan for arms reduction to be discussed by the Assembly next year was too radical to consider. "How are we going in the next year to draw up plans of the disarmament of the United States and Russia?" was a question put by one of the delegates. So making a virtue of necessity, and foreseeing the gathering storm, Cecil presented the hurriedly prepared substitute resolution, which simply provides for the submission next year to the Council of general proposals in the form of a draft treaty "or some other definite plan" for a general reduction of armaments.

All of which goes to show that the outlook for a frank and open discussion of the armament question within a reasonable time is, at least, very dubious. One can see ahead a vision of oceans of debate rising and falling with the discussion before regional understandings can be reached. Lord Cecil's bold attack on the dangers of delay, and his charge that the delegates were "playing" with the disarmament question, seem to have produced no other effect than to convince him of the hopelessness of making real headway for many months to come.

May we argue from Geneva to Washington? Our International Disarmament Conference meets within a month. Its work will be greatly simplified and the tracks cleared for business from the very beginning. If we may judge from the expectations formed of this momentous Assembly, it will not submit to unnecessary delays in the discussion of the great things that are on the program. And we trust that it may be able to keep the main purpose of the Conference steadily in view, and not to let it get sidetracked or blocked through either "headlong steps" or "regional misunderstandings." Above all, it is the general desire that nothing should be sought to be accomplished in secret. Let the stormy episode in the Geneva Conference which we have described be a warning to those who may be disposed to strive for needless delay. The world wants peace and disarmament and the reduction of its oppressive burdens. It will not brook much delay. Let us show an example of persistence and progress in the endeavor to meet the world's desire.

No Secrecy

THERE is practically a unanimous desire on the part of the American people that at the coming Disarmament Conference the sessions of the Conference be in the largest degree free from the old-world intrigue and diplomatic sparring and secret methods that have been heretofore employed between the nations whenever international questions were being discussed.

The Churches and Disarmament

ONE more week after the present issue will close the Christian Herald's appeal to the Churches for united endorsement of the Conference on Disarmament and approval of the course of President Harding in bringing it about.

It is of the highest importance that all the endorsements by churches and other bodies should be in at the earliest possible moment. Let your church sign up at once and forward it to the address below. The following is the form of endorsement:

WHEREAS, President Harding has called a Conference on Disarmament, to be composed of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers and China to be held in Washington, D. C., on November 11, 1921, and

WHEREAS, the Christian people of the United States of America of all denominations are by their profession of belief in the teaching and Spirit of Jesus Christ committed to the policy of World Peace and to Disarmament as a means to the accomplishment of that goal; Therefore

BE IT RESOLVED, That we, the pastor, officers and members of . . . . .

Church, do hereby express our hearty approval of the action of President Harding and pledge to him our support in every effort to bring about World Peace.

Date . . . . .

(Use this blank or copy in typewritten form, sign, and return to "Peace Endorsement Committee, Room 94, Bible House, New York City," at the earliest possible moment.)

We have asked a good many public men and international authorities on legal affairs if there was any reason why all the discussions of the conference should not be made openly, and in the full light of the public.

The answer has been there is no reason, except selfish and narrow ambition to get the better of some other party in the final settlement.

If there is any really good reason why the sessions of the Conference should not be open to the press, we would like to know what they are. Who will be harmed by the most frank and public discussion of all the questions that may arise? At this stage in the history of the world's affairs, it is the right of the people to know in the fullest detail what the representatives of different nations are asking or promising. What possible advantage can the public have in secrecy or subterfuge or closed doors? What question can arise that ought to be discussed by the nations that the public ought not to know? If there is any such question that is going to be raised at the conference, that is the very question that the people have a right to know.

The old-world diplomacy and intrigue and secrecy in matters of statecraft have been discredited by mankind. They have no place in the dignified and honest gathering that ought to be a marked characteristic of this notable meeting of the nations.

If the press of America is allowed to have free access to all the sessions, and if the freest and most unhindered discussion of all matters that belong to the conference goes forward, the people of the world will witness, perhaps for the first time in human history, the fact of the rights of mankind being put first, instead of some secret diplomatic move that needs concealment from the vulgar herd.

But there is no vulgar herd. There will be some noble and acute mentalities gathered at the conference table, selected by their respective nations to represent their countries. But at the same time there will be millions of human beings outside the selected groups that will possess as clear an understanding of the issues at stake and as capable of discussing them as the persons chosen to represent their nations.

And more than that, let it be understood the people are the ones who are concerned in these deliberations. It is not kings and emperors and diplomats and military enthusiasts that are to be considered at this conference. It is the people. Their turn has come for a square deal. Kings and dignitaries and cabinets and national rights have had their turn. Now it is mankind's turn.

Let there be no secrecy at the Disarmament gathering. If there is any need of it, we would like to know what it is, and whose interests will be served by it. Can any one tell us?

And let the people remember that this conference will be in vain unless the main thing is kept openly in sight all the time, and that is disarmament. What has secrecy to do with that?

The Man with Grit

WHILE we may not regard Mr. Edison as in any sense an authority on matters theological, there is little question about the value of his working philosophy as applied to human life and experience. He is one of the best examples of the American who possesses the quality of grit. Those who know him well will remember when he first came to the big city in a suit of butternut, and his pockets stuffed with tools. Whatever discouragements he may have met at the outset, it was grit that enabled him to overcome them. Like Whittington, he heard the bells calling him to something big in the battle of life, and he girded himself for the struggle.

We recall how, when he was in the service of a group of telegraph companies, he overcame by sheer grit and mechanical ability an injunction which had silenced at noon all the telegraph instruments of the "opposition," as these companies were then called, and with a clipper and a sheet of tin, fixed up a temporary "sounder," which in an hour or two was clicking in every one of the "opposition" offices all over the country. Many will recall another occasion on which he was showing the mysterious "white light" to a group of editors in the Farmers' Institute Building, New York. They went away and wrote in their publications that it was a brilliant "scientific toy"; but Edison knew better. He had the grit to plug ahead with the "mystery," and the now universally used incandescent electric light is the result. The wisecracks who heard the first Edison phonograph thought it another "toy," but the world's millions who listen to the phonograph today know better.

And now, having conquered many things, by skill and courage, Mr. Edison suggests grit as a remedy for the upset times in which we are living. Fear, he says, must be overcome by faith and hard work, and Congress can hasten the return of good times by wise legislation. Those who are lamenting present economic conditions might well take a leaf out of the notebook of the inventor. Courage and the will to do things are needed both by capital and labor to overcome conditions of depression.

"The point to be driven home now," says the inventor, "is that the country always recovers from these recurring cycles of depression, and goes forward with greater strides than ever before. We will get over this one, too. The tide has already begun to turn. When the forces in our economic machine are adjusted, it will all come right again. The psychology of fear is the prime cause of the present depression. Our people have been frightened out of good times unnecessarily, because our country and its economic conditions are fundamentally sound and, being sound, they will finally triumph."

High or Low?

AT THE recent annual convention of the National Education Association, the statement was made by Maurice Rieker, assistant director of the United States public health service, that race suicide was being practiced on a vast scale by American college graduates. His official statement was:

"Investigation by the Federal Health Service over a period of years indicates that the progeny of 1,000 graduates from college like Harvard, Yale, Princeton, Vassar and Smith will not exceed 50, in 100 years from now, while in a like period the births among illiterate foreigners will be multiplied at least a hundred times. The ratio will be 50 men and women descended from educated parents, to 100,000 begotten by ignorant parents."

If it is a fact that the births in the families of the ignorant and uneducated parents are going to exceed so vastly in number the births in the families of the educated and college-bred parents, what of the future effect on mankind? If, on the other hand, one child of educated parents is more than twice as efficient and influential as two children of ignorant parents, how shall the ratio of progress be maintained under any system of education which shirks its responsibility for parenthood?

It looks like a problem in moral arithmetic.

"Fundamentally sound, financially strong, industrially unimpaired, commercially consistent and politically unafraid, there ought to be work for everybody in the United States who chooses to work, and our condition at home and our place in the world depend on everybody going to work." With these words of President Harding before them, the members of the National Unemployment Conference are studying the problems of the jobless men. The picture was taken in front of the White House.

The World News of the Week

The International Situation in Washington

THE Washington Government has at last formally admitted that there is such a body as the League of Nations. In one day the secretariat of the League in Geneva received fourteen notes from the Secretary of State acknowledging communications addressed to the United States during the period from February 4 to August 29. The matters considered ranged all the way from such important topics as the world court to minor ship registry problems.

When it first became known that the Department of State was failing to reply to communications from the League the explanation was made that the subjects involved were being taken up with the individual governments interested. There is assurance now, however, that all notes from the League are being promptly acknowledged.

While it seemed a few days ago that the separate Treaty of Peace with Germany would have a very serious time in the Senate, with possibilities of failure to ratify, the atmosphere has cleared up rapidly. Such strong supporters of the Wilson program as the New York Times and New York World agree that ratification is almost a foregone conclusion as a result of conferences among the Republican Senators and a meeting of the Democratic members. A final vote is expected on October 15 after the automatic rejection of three reservations to be proposed and supported by twenty-one Democrats. The same group, with possibly a few Republicans, probably will vote against ratification although there are rumors that the solid Democratic bloc will be broken.

Arrangements for the great international conference on limitation of armament and Far Eastern affairs are maturing rapidly. President Harding, according to the present plan, will deliver an address of welcome in which he will voice the aspirations of this country and suggest a chart of principles that should govern the deliberations of the conference. Organization may be effected the same day with the naming of an American chairman for the conference, and an American secretary-general.

Reports from Japan indicate that her delegates will adopt as a fundamental policy the contention that the famous "twenty-one demands" and the Shantung settlement are facts accomplished and as such not subject to consideration in the conference. They will be willing to discuss a curtailment of her naval program in a spirit of concession and compromise, but in view of the fact that the twenty-one demands and Shantung contain a good share of the war danger in the Far East it is agreed that the path of the conferees will be a difficult one.

A Proposal to Cut Prices

THE conference on unemployment meeting at the call of the Government in Washington apparently has decided that one big thing must be done at once to revive industry and that is bring down prices of manufacturers and retailers to a point more nearly approximating the pre-war level. The Committee on Emergency Measures by Manufacturers is strongly favorable to the idea as the only feasible method of breaking the "buyers' strike" and opening up the normal flow of trade. It is frankly admitted among the members of the conference that the present acute situation is due in large measure to the disinclination of both manufacturers and retailers to take a loss on raw materials or finished products bought at the peak or on a declining market. Now industry and commerce see that a change in tactics is necessary and will unite in a program to dispose of their stocks at "replacement" prices. Some of the labor members are skeptical as to the willingness of industries to meet such a program, but they also agree that the best way to start factories is to get prices down to the point where the public will buy.

An analysis of the unemployment situation presented to the Conference indicates that there are between 3,700,000 and 4,000,000 unemployed in the United States with approximately 2,000,000 in what may be regarded as the emergency class. This is opposed to figures made public recently by the Department of Labor estimating a total of 5,735,000.

Bishop Lambuth Dies

WORD has been received of the death in a hospital at Yokohama of Bishop Walter B. Lambuth of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. His death followed an operation. Bishop Lambuth was a member of one of the great missionary families of the country. His great-grandfather went as a missionary to the wilds of Tennessee in 1800. His grandfather was a missionary to the French and Indians in 1821. His father went as a missionary to China in 1854, and he was born the same year in Shanghai. Returning in his youth to the United States he completed a collegiate and medical course, and in his turn entered the China field where he has been active all through his manhood. He was elected bishop in 1910.

Bishop Lambuth was a warm friend and supporter of the Christian Herald and the most cordial relations existed with him in all work undertaken by this magazine in China. He returned to the United States last December, attended the foreign missions conference at Garden City, L. I., in January, aided tremendously in arousing interest in the China Famine Fund in a dozen states, and left to resume his work in the Orient early in the spring. The family home is Nashville, Tenn.

New Irish Peace Move

PREMIER LLOYD GEORGE has extended one more invitation to the Irish Republicans for a meeting to discuss Ireland's problems. The date for the conference is set as October 11, and the Dail Eireann has accepted the invitation. The premier reiterates the impossibility of the British Government recognizing Irish independence, but he hopes for an agreement that will attach Ireland to "the community of nations known as the British Empire" on some plan that will be consistent with "Irish national aspirations." Observers in England see in the latest step signs for an eventual settlement of the century-long conflict between the two islands.

New Altitude Record

LIEUTENANT JOHN A. MACREADY of the Army air service has just set a new altitude record in which he reached a height never before attained by a human being. In a test flight made at Dayton, O., he pushed his airplane to 40,800 feet above sea level, or nearly eight miles. He made use of oxygen above 20,000 feet but when nearly at the "ceiling" of the flight ice accumulated even in the oxygen tube and he had to resort to an emergency tank that he carried strapped to his body.

No Favor for Bolshevism

SECRETARY HUGHES has sent a letter to the Chita Republic reaffirming the determination of the American Government to withhold recognition of the Russian Soviet Government. Lord Curzon, as British Foreign Minister, has addressed a note to Moscow accusing the Bolsheviks of violating their trade agreement with Great Britain by establishing consulates in Afghanistan which are used largely for propaganda purposes. Information received in Washington, furthermore, indicates that the states bordering Soviet Russia are thoroughly dissatisfied with the manner in which Russia is abiding by the series of treaties establishing peace along the frontier. Poland has sent a sharp note to demand fulfillment of the Riga treaty with the payment of 30,000,000 gold rubles reparations. The correspondence has caused a great increase in activity in the Red army which is disturbing the capitals of the continent.

Presbyterians Answer Lambreth Appeal

THE delegates to the Pan-Presbyterian Alliance who have just concluded a convention in Pittsburgh adopted almost unanimously a pronouncement in answer to the appeal of the Lambeth Conference for the unity of all Christian churches.

The pronouncement welcomes steps toward the reunion of Christendom, but sets forth that there can be no progress toward reunion until the conferring churches recognize one another's church standing, or in other words, when the Anglican Church does not require additional ordination of Non-conformist clergymen.

"The responsibility of giving formal answer to the invitation contained in this appeal," says the pronouncement "must so far as churches holding the Presbyterian order are concerned rest with the supreme courts of these churches. This council is not a legislative court, but it may and does express the hope that the churches it represents will be able to meet in conference with our brethren of Lambeth in the spirit of prayer and of willingness to learn together the mind of Christ concerning the peace and unity of His Church on earth."

"The Council records its opinion that such conference must be as between churches meeting on equal terms and must be unrestricted as to all questions of ecclesiastical order. Further, its members are at one in declaring their conviction that there will be substantial progress toward reunion only when the conferring churches are ready frankly to recognize one another's church standing and to accompany words of unity by acts of unity in the fellowship of the Lord's table, and in co-operation in the Lord's work."

The next meeting of the Presbyterians will be held in Cardiff, Wales, in 1925.

Important Missionary Gathering

THE first meeting of the International Missionary Committee, representing the missionary boards and societies of all home base lands, has been in session at Lake Mohonk. Sitting with the members from North America, Europe, Australasia and South Africa were one missionary and two nationals from India, China and Japan respectively, these being the mission countries in which there are federated national Christian councils in position to appoint member-delegates.

The Mutilated Bible

A Sermon by REV. H. C. WILKINSON, D.D.*

TEXT—Jere. 36: 23. "And it came to pass that when Jehudi had read three or four leaves, he cut it with the pen-knife, and cast it in the fire that was on the hearth, until all the roll was consumed."

IT IS evident that human nature does not change with the passing centuries. Conditions of life change. Social and political environments change. Our knowledge grows wider with the revolving years; but the human heart beats with the same stroke in every age.

There is nothing in the portraiture of Bible characters that need impress us as strange. They are the portraits of universal characteristics. We never think of Abraham as a wandering Arab shiek. Daniel wears no Persian fez. We do not think of Joseph's gorgeous robe of state or Elijah's swarthy half-nakedness. We see their hopes, fears, dreams, passions. To us they all speak English—and fight the battles of our spiritual conflicts.

The story of Jehoiakim is perfectly modern. He resents the interference of the preacher with the affairs of state. He is angry that men should presume to arraign his acts. What does he care for the truth? Does this upstart preacher dare to bring him to book? "Bring in his prophecy then, and let me hear what he did say." And when he has heard Jehudi read a little of it, he takes out his pen-knife and cuts three or four leaves and then throws the whole thing into the fire. He will dispose of the truth by burning the sermon. He will get rid of the truth of God by destroying the paper on which it is written.

Some people in the past have thought that Jehudi and Jehoiakim were excellent types of higher critics. Haven't men been cutting the Bible to pieces because they believed they had found its history faulty and its facts untrustworthy? Yes, they have, but from no such spirit as actuated Jehoiakim. They thought they were serving truth—not destroying it, and they have not waited for prophets to rewrite, in more significant meaning, the same truths when they found themselves corrected. They have done it themselves. The services of historians to the Bible have been infinitely greater than any damage they were supposed to do.

We used to be told that "Moses could not have written the Pentateuch because in his time the act of writing was not developed." Now we know there was a brilliant civilization three thousand years before the time of Moses. Men said the story of the kings with whom Abraham fought was purely fictional; since then we have found their names in the cuneiform inscriptions. We used to be told that Belshazzar was no historical character, and since then have found numerous clay tablets with his own signature on them. We were told at one time that the story of the Egyptian slavery of the Israelites was untrustworthy, until it dawned upon some that the racial traditions of the Jews themselves were all against such a theory; that no nation ever gratuitously wrote into its history a period of slavery. Race, pride, human nature were all against it. Men used to scout the story of the Hittites given in the Bible. They said there was no such great people as the Bible showed them to be; and yet, in our own time, the story of the Hittites has been rewritten from secular history, and we know them now to have been one of the powerful peoples of the early time.

And in the light of the marvelous discoveries of modern scholarship, as brought up by the spade of the archeologist and the patience of the antiquarian, the Bible has been rewritten in clearer and more impressive significance. Wherever historical research has brought readjustment of Scriptural interpretation, the rewritten truth is seen to have immensely augmented the richness of the original. The outline maps of the Old Testament times have been filled in with populous cities, seething social conditions, political and religious activities, and all the various and motley figures of evolving civilizations. The Bible means immensely more to us as we understand the life, the times, the relations, of the people through whom it came.

SOME people have thought Jehudi was a type of the scientific men who have been inclined to cut up the Bible as unscientific. How it has been laughed at for its Creation story, and its Jonah story, and for its Red Sea story, and its manna story! And there is sure to be some freshman scientist who thinks he will demonstrate his greatness in science by a sneer at the Bible! Strange that he should overlook the fact that the greatest of all names in science are the men who are earnest believers of the Bible—and who do not see any incongruity between proper interpretation of the Bible and any fact of science. There is a recent book with the answers of the one hundred and twenty-five leading scientists as to whether there is any real conflict between the facts of science and the fundamentals of Christianity, and their verdict is absolutely unanimous. Lord Lister recently died. His answer is typical: "There is no antagonism between the religion of Jesus Christ and any fact scientifically established." Sir George Crookes says the same. Sir Oliver Lodge says the same, and so on down the list.

No one needs to be ashamed of the science of the Bible, although the Book is given to teach us moral truth and not scientific truth—to teach us how to live and what to hope and not to be a text-book on the universe of material things. After thirty-five centuries, it is still in good scientific standing. That is true of no other scientific theory in the world. You can scarcely keep up with the procession of passing scientific theories. Mr. Huxley hasn't been dead many years. He said there were two absolute certainties in science—the facts of matter and force—and if Mr. Huxley were alive today, he would know that there is not a single first-class scientist who would stand with him on the first. The history of the past the Spanish rule was broken by an American fleet which sunk and destroyed a fleet in the West Indies with the loss of but a single American man—when he can read in the monthly magazines of immediately preceding dates that the Spanish ships were so far superior to the American as to give the American ships not even a slender chance? What will the future say to the story that the same sort of a record came from the other fleet over in the Philippine Islands? The similarity of these two stories will forever establish the Americans as untrustworthy chroniclers. They will of course protest that they are evidently different versions of the same story! Dewey is but another name for Sampson, and the exploits of the latter are but nineteenth century rehearsal of the ancient stories of Samson told by Israel!

The records of this period of American history are full of contradictions. These contradictions render untrustworthy all records of the nineteenth century American life. Cut them out!

No—we will not cut them out—for they are true. And we will not eliminate the story of the unusual, which in Bible times arrested men's attention, and made them aware of God operative in their behalf and always on the field of human endeavor. We will not eliminate the striking facts which made men aware of the infinite and eternally righteous God against whose laws men rush only at their peril. We will thank God that the men of old learned the lesson, and wrote it down as they learned it—and we will endeavor to show that we, with our larger outlook, can see at least as vividly as they the working of the same righteous, just and merciful God.

BUT we will not be true to the story unless we remind ourselves that the main reason why Jehoiakim and Jehudi destroyed the Word of God was because it set standards of conduct which Jehoiakim was not willing to obey. Analyze the hostility to the Bible and you always find its root in a bad heart. The Bible utters some terrible warnings against sin, and there are people who would like to cut out every reference to sin. So one comes up and says: "Cut that out which says, 'The soul that sinneth it shall die.' Man is incapable of sin." Modern society says: "Cut out that which says, 'For this cause shall a man leave father and mother and cleave unto his wife.' Marriage is solely a civil contract, to be terminated at the pleasure of the parties involved. Cut this out which says: 'If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross and follow Me.' Life is for self-expression! Cut this out which says: 'Every man must give account of himself to God.' We are emancipated from all superstitions. The world has long since passed the period when it could be made to shiver by the pictures of judgment! Christianity is a relic of the dark ages and this is the age of reason! It fetters human freedom and we mean to be free. Cast it into the fire!"

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"From Every Stormy Wind That Blows," or "Rock of Ages."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—John 15: 1-15. Christ, the True Vine.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation—(See page 757, first column.)

Sermon—"THE MUTILATED BIBLE"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—These may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"One Sweetly Solemn Thought," or "I'm a Pilgrim, I'm a Stranger."

Benediction—By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

May the faith we already have be stronger, and the joy we already have be purer, and the peace we already have be deeper, as we part from this service to share our faith, our joy and our peace with the world that needs them all. In Jesus' Name we ask it. AMEN.

should teach the scientist humility. The "instruments of precision" are always left behind when we enter the field of theory.

Scientific discovery has done immense service to the Bible. Mitchell, who understood the voices in which the heavens declare the glory of God, and who read the significance of God's embodied word with delight and fed upon God's word as his daily bread—testifies, "We find an aptness and propriety in all these astronomical illustrations which are not weakened but strengthened amazingly when viewed in the light of our present knowledge." And Herschel corroborates in an earlier time as he says, "All human discoveries seem to be made only for the purpose of confirming more strongly the truths that come from on high and are contained in the sacred writings." Dana, addressing a graduating class, said: "Young men, you are going out into a world where you must meet an increasing attack upon your faith. Let me ask you to remember as my parting counsel, that wherever you are in doubt amid the confused voices of scientific controversy, you may always with perfect confidence affix your faith to any statement of the Word of God."

EXTRAORDINARY are some of the statements of the Bible—yet not so extraordinary as the facts of experience. The migration of the children of Israel from Egypt to Canaan is not nearly so wonderful an achievement as the migration of European peoples to America in the last twenty-five years. Will the future historian of the nineteenth century be able to write so that the people will believe the story of a million a year crossing the turbulent ocean, to make their home in the land of freedom? Who will believe that

THE Word was rewritten and many words were added thereto, and every year God adds words to the revelations of His Book. Every year they are demonstrated true.

Do you remember Schiller's poem on the veiled image of Sais? Do you remember how the young man searching for truth came to the Temple of Truth, and saw an image veiled behind the altar, and gave eager inquiry as to what the veil concealed? And the old priest replied "the face of Truth." Impetuously the young man stepped over the altar to lift the veil, when the old man put out his hand and stopped his rashness. "But do you mean to say," queried the young man, "that you have ministered here in this presence and never have looked upon her face?" And the old man quietly answered, "I did not dare." And the young man went away. But at night, when the temple was deserted and still, and only the moonlight fell upon altar and statue behind it, the young man stole back and, stepping into the altar, he lifted the veil from the face of Truth. What he saw then no one ever knew, for in the morning they found him stretched senseless before the altar. And never afterwards did men see him smile. And when men asked him what he saw that night behind the veil, he only shook his head and said, "Woe, woe to him that looks upon the face of Truth through wrong."

Some day, for each of us, the curtain of the unseen, behind which we have walked each day and behind whose mysteries we would fain have often pierced, will lift and we shall each of us gaze, whether we will or not, into the unveiled face of God. Well for us then if we have believed His Word, and followed with honest heart its precepts.

Confidence Born

SUNDAY. Psa. 62 : 2. "I shall not be greatly moved." V. 7, "I shall not be moved." I have brought these two sentences together from different parts of the same psalm, because they seem to suggest a vital progress in the spiritual life of the psalmist. The psalmist is contemplating hostile circumstances. He is anticipating tempests of antagonism. He hears the whirlwind raging over the waste. And as he sees himself caught in the blast, he seems a little shaken by the force of the assault; but he is not overwhelmed and on the whole he retains his place. "I shall not be greatly moved!" A little later he looks again at the coming tempest, and he sees himself the center of the violence, but he sees himself immovable. "I shall not be moved!" The significance of the word "greatly" has vanished and his mood is transformed. In the first condition there is a trembling; in the second condition there is the firmness of a blessed assurance. In the first there is a shiver of fear—"I shall not be greatly moved"; in the second there is the unshaken confidence of a splendid faith—"I shall not be moved." In the former experience he is dislodged a little from his standing; in the latter experience he is steadfast, immovable always abounding in the work of the Lord. In the first expression of his mood there is something young, uncertain, and immature; in the second there is the voice of a more vital trust, and the suggestion of spiritual maturity. He passes from the painful wobbling of, "I shall not be greatly moved," to the masculine serenity of "I shall not be moved."

Now, what has happened between the first experience and the second? This has happened; he has been in deeper communion with God. That is the secret. His trembling spirit was soothed in the divine communion. The timid flutterings of his heart were quieted on the bosom of his God. That is the secret! It is as when some frightened child is caught up in its mother's arms and feels the cuddling strength of her embrace. This is the calmness which comes from sharing the stronger life of another.

Who has not had this experience even on the lower plane of human fellowships? It may be we are riven with uncertainties and beset with fears; but we pass into the presence and communion of some strong, serene man and we drink his peace. One strong quiet man, endowed with large understanding and splendid self-possession, can chase away the fears of a whole nation. He is peace to all his environment.

How much more profoundly true is all this when we raise the relation to our fellowship with God! Fears flourish in mean communions. And so it is with worries, which are the prolific children of fear. They all grow fat and strong when life is lived in small and confined circles, and is bereft of air and vision. Foul things breed in closed rooms. There is something very fusty, something strongly inclining to sickness and fainting in a chamber which never received cleansing, vitalizing visits from the air of larger worlds. And so it is with the soul.

Deeper communion with God is the great secret of spiritual maturity. Our preparation for the meeting of trying and exacting circumstances is often very ill-arranged. We do this, and that, and the other; we fuss around in twenty ways and our life remains "a haunt of fears." We meet our days with a divided life and our heart is not fixed in healthy serenity. We have not the sovereign command which belongs to peace. If only we would give to divine communion the time and the care we give to minor preparations, we should put on strength and confidence like a robe. "I sought the Lord and He heard me, and He delivered me from all my fears."

"Take from our lives the strain and stress!" Yes, but who can do that but God? He can do it, and by His grace it is done. In His strengthening, restoring fellowship we can face all our hostile circumstances with "ordered lives" which confess the beauty of God's peace. J. H. J.

The Measure of Religious Experience

MONDAY. II Cor. 10 : 12. "But they, measuring themselves by themselves, are not wise." Christ being our measure and pattern, let him that glorieth, glory in the Lord. In your Christian life, it is not wisdom to measure your religious experience by the testimony of another. Each soul consciousness in Jesus is a personal one, unlike every other in some respect. Our knowledge of salvation is as individualistic as the face. But there are no two faces just alike, as there are no two flowers or trees alike. Variety in nature contributes to the beautiful. So in the garden of the Lord, growing graces, we have unity and variety. Every flower of love, joy and peace will open with a little different form and color from every other. Infinite love adapts itself to individual conditions, supplying each personal need.

Young people often come into the experience of conversion gradually. They have been so faithfully trained in the home and Sunday school that they cannot, like some others, speak of the moment when Jesus came into their hearts. Is not the coming of the day so gradual that there is no moment when we can say, "The night is entirely gone and the morning here," but a little later we can exclaim, "I know the day has dawned"? A person may not be able to tell the day he was born into the world, but he can say, "I know I am alive." Therefore, everyone may be conscious of the fact of the new birth, though not able to fix a time, the exact date of the change. But all can say with Peter, "Lord, Thou knowest that I love Thee."

Is it not so in receiving the Pentecostal baptism? Each experience is peculiar to the individual, as each testimony will be unlike every other; a variety of phrases will be used to express the great blessing. It will be called "the higher life," "the beautiful rest," "the perfect peace," "the way of holiness," "the baptism of power," "the fullness of the spirit," or, like Paul's "sanctified holy," or John's "perfect love." The everlasting arms will have a special embrace for each personality. E. W. C.

The Christian High Lineage

TUESDAY. Matt. 1 : 1. "The book of the generation of Jesus Christ." The New Testament might have begun with a creed; but it did not. It might have begun with a moral code; but it did not. Both doctrine and ethics are vitally important; but Christ himself is Alpha and Omega, the first and last letters of the whole alphabet of life and character. He is the beginning of all high purpose and splendid hope; the end of all true ambition and holy endeavor. He is first, last, midst, and all in all.

It is our privilege—and higher privilege there cannot be—to belong—if we so choose—to the new family which was thus begun in Jesus as the Christ. In him we are received by adoption into the great household which finds its shibboleth of unity in the words, "Abba Father." It is written, "He came unto his own and his own received him not; but as many as received him to them gave he power to become the sons of God."

How all carnal kinship dwindles in view of this glorious truth! Far better to be of this lineage than of the line royal. "Now are we sons of God—and if sons, then heirs, heirs of God and joint heirs with Jesus Christ to an inheritance incorruptible, undefiled and that fadeth not away." D. J. B.

One Thing Only

WEDNESDAY. Heb. 12 : 3. "Consider Him." Only two words, but if accepted, the solution of every problem, guidance for all the way, help in each hour of trial, constant comfort and eternal assurance.

The story is told of a teacher in Constantinople who, in order to test a student, asked him to carry a vessel filled to the brim with water on a level with his eyes, and not only up one crowded street and down another, but through the busy market-place or bazaar, with the injunction not to take his eyes off the water nor to spill a drop. The pupil did as he was told, carrying the vessel on a level with his eyes, full to the brim with water. Up one street he went and down another, across the bazaar and back to the class-room of his teacher, who asked him if he saw the Sultan and the procession of courtiers while he was in the bazaar.

"No," replied the pupil, "you told me to bear the vessel on a level with my eyes, full to the brim, to see that not a drop was spilled, nor to take my eyes off the water. I have obeyed, I saw no one."

"Well done," replied the teacher, "you have been obedient and carried out my desire just as I told you." So God, speaking the word for human living, tells us to fix our eyes upon Him and that ever through busy street and crowded market looking to Him, considering Him, the sights, foibles and foolishness of the world will never be able to separate us from the One who can make life worth while. H. H.

The Light That Shines

THURSDAY. Matt. 5 : 14. "Ye are the light of the world." The Christian is the "salt of the earth," the "leaven of influence" and the "light of the world." Darkness, in the thought of the Hebrews, was always a symbol of synecopated sin, while light was always the beautiful symbol of good. What light does in the natural world, the Christian is capable of doing in the spiritual world. As the realm of nature is dependent on the sun for light and heat, so the realm of man's moral nature is dependent on the light of Christ which is reflected in the lives of His followers. When Jesus said, "Ye are the light of the world" He gave the Church one of its profoundest and most important of utterances.

Light has various functions, the chief of which is to reveal and to guide. We strike a light in a dark cellar, not that we may create anything, but that we may see the relation we sustain to the other objects in that cellar. When we understand that relationship, it is not a difficult matter to direct our steps. When Jesus came into the world He found the blind leading the blind. In a great measure it is the same today. Multitudes are in need of light, groping in a false and dangerous relationship. When Jesus went out to His Triumph over the world, He said to His followers, "Now ye are the light of the world." Not creeds, but you. You must be the incarnation of truth. You must be the torch of revelation. You must be the manifestation of sane thinking and normal living. The light which you have from Me, the light with which your own life has been illuminated, must shine on your environment.

The challenge is to us all to be "light of the world." This means that as followers of the Christ of the world program we are not to be pocket flashlights, but dazzling noon-day suns, not a pale moonlight, but a full-orbed ray that penetrates from the corners and beyond the shadows, until every corner of the world is flooded with the knowledge of God and His amazing grace and love. R. B.

The Blessing of Liberty

FRIDAY. Isa. 61 : 1. "To proclaim liberty to the captive." One of the chief purposes of human governments is the bestowal of liberty upon all its subjects. No other word so thrills the patriotic heart. Liberty is loved more than life; men will roam sea and land to rest under the folds of the flag of liberty. Its waving leads legions onward to the battlefield, where soldiers die happily while liberty's banner is in the van of victory.

Liberty means the slave emancipated from his chains; it means freedom from the rack of torture, from the heel of tyrants, the rule of bigots, the bond binding the mind and the soul of manhood. Liberty means the banishment of the taskmaster of the oppressor, of the devil and his minions. Liberty stands under the stars and sings the song of freedom from the power of sin and from the crushing rule of despotism and militarism.

The great inheritance of a liberty-loving people is its memories of its heroes; its poets, historians, statesmen, legislators; its great givers and philanthropists. The organization of the nation may perish, but the influence of its mighty products will be garnered in the kingdom of God forever and ever. If we could hear the voice of the millions who have fallen on the battlefields of earth, would they not exclaim, "We died that liberty might live, that righteousness and truth might reign among all the peoples of the earth." E. W. C.

Crucial Hours

SATURDAY. Mark 14 : 37. "Sleepest thou? Couldst thou not watch one hour?" There is a vital lesson for all who would try to make a better world, in the experience of the chosen disciples, in the garden of Gethsemane. Surely, we say to ourselves, they will have learned the Master's lesson of the Kingdom ere this, yet right up to the edge of Calvary, and beyond, they walk with wavering footsteps, and hold to their tasks with trembling hands.

We long to have Peter, James and John, who were with Christ in the crisis of the mountain-glory, remain steadfast to their Master, in the sorrow of Gethsemane, and the shame of Golgotha. We are hurt and amazed to find that they fail Him—fail Him in the garden, in the court, on the Calvary way. They desired very much to help their Lord, but they were defeated by the weariness of the body. The power of the body, the needs as well as the lusts of the flesh, must be reckoned with by those who labor to create a Christian world.

No good cause was ever yet overwhelmed from without; it is always defeated from within and so many of the idealists who want a new social order utterly ignore the needs of controlling the instincts and appetites of their own body, with the result that their ideals are defeated, and the cause betrayed.

For nothing today does the cause of God and humanity suffer so much as for the lack of that cool moral courage which will stand up and bear witness to the truth, no matter what the penalty. The evils that are in the world will not go, any more than slavery went, until there are men like Lincoln and Garrison, who will not equivocate, or be silent, and who will insist upon being heard.

We cannot help others, until we ourselves are able to control the flesh, and overcome its weaknesses. W. S. S.

Rainy-Weather Clothes

IT WAS a rainy day — a rainy day plus! The weather was so very inclement that the word rainy didn't describe it at all.

The rain fell in veritable sheets of gray water; a heavy wind, slashing down the side streets, was doing as much damage to umbrellas and dresses and awnings as possible. It was a good day to stay in the house—the sort of a day when open fires and kitchen ranges have a decided charm.

And yet there were many folk upon the broad dripping avenues and the wind-swept side streets. For in the city business goes on as usual, no matter how unpleasant the weather may be. There were men in tight-buttoned coats, and women in mackintoshes. There were small hurrying boys, and young girls with damp slipped feet—for the modern girl is wont to disdain rubbers! And there were many others, all hastening—in the way of business—toward some none too-certain refuge from the weather.

I, too, was out upon the street. I, too, was hurrying to keep a business appointment. My heavy jacket was buttoned close to my throat, and my umbrella was held low over my head. Despite the rain I did not feel very wet or uncomfortable. I was almost smiling, I think, when the wind—taking advantage of my apparent security—swept suddenly upon me and wrenched my umbrella from my unsuspecting hand. Before I could capture it, it had danced away from me, into the middle of the street. And as I darted after it the wind—not quite satisfied—gave one more naughty puff. And the umbrella, eluding my eager hand, found a lodging place between the heavy wheels of a passing motor truck. There was a slight grinding noise and, as the truck went on its way, all unknowing, I saw that my umbrella had been reduced to a bent wire or two, a broken wooden handle, and a few fragments of black silk.

THERE was nothing to do but buy a new umbrella, for the gray sheets of rain were doing really terrible things to my hat and jacket. Without more ado I turned from the wreck in the middle of the street and scurried into a nearby shop. And there, pausing in front of a counter, I made known my wants.

The clerk behind the counter was a young girl with pink cheeks, and the star dust of dreams in her clear blue eyes. It seemed to me, as I glanced at her, that she should be doing something more colorful and vivid than the mere selling of umbrellas. She had all of the clean romance and freshness of spring-time about her. And umbrellas, at best, are not exciting! And yet, in just a very few minutes, I found that I had made a mistake. For selling umbrellas, to her, was not a stupid profession. She made it real and beautiful by the power of her imagination.

"Do you know," she said to me, and her voice was the most cheerful thing that I had listened to for many a day, "do you know—I wish you wouldn't buy a black umbrella!"

I had asked for a black umbrella. I have always asked for black umbrellas, quite as a matter of habit. No other clerk had ever suggested any change. So it was not strange that the girl's suggestion—if it could be called a suggestion—came as a complete surprise to me.

"Just why," I asked her, "do you wish that I wouldn't buy a black umbrella?"

The girl smiled up at me, and a tiny dimple flickered, for an instant, in one of her pink cheeks.

"I don't like black umbrellas," she told me, "I hate to sell 'em! I'd almost rather sell no umbrellas than black ones. Rainy days are dreary enough, goodness knows, without black things. And yet people always wear dark old clothes on rainy days and almost all of them buy dark old umbrellas—just as you were going to buy one!"

When They're Cheerful They Seem to Make the Whole World Brighter

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

I couldn't help laughing softly. But I wasn't laughing at the girl—I was laughing with her.

"What shall I buy?" I questioned, "since I don't want to hurt your feelings—what shall I buy?"

All at once the girl was childishly eager.

"Buy a red umbrella," she told me, "or a green one, or a purple one. They don't cost a bit more than the black umbrellas, and they're much prettier! Why, just seeing a gay umbrella opened up on the street makes the whole world seem brighter and happier. Rainy-day things—clothes and hats and neckties and umbrellas should be cheerful enough to make folks forget all about the weather!"

I compromised on a purple umbrella. I paid for it with a sensation of utter recklessness, and said good-bye to the pink-cheeked little clerk, and went out again into the street. And with a feeling of extreme consciousness (for I have owned black umbrellas all of my life!) I opened it up for all of the world to gaze upon. And then—because I had suddenly remembered my business appointment—I hurried on.

THE purple umbrella was bright. And pretty, too. It made a pleasant little reflection upon the wet sidewalk—a wee lavender colored reflection that scurried in front of me like a small bit of rainbow. In all the sea of moving black umbrellas it was the only light spot—the only cheerful color note. It made me vaguely happy—curiously proud. I felt like a little girl-child with her first pink sash. I felt as a small boy feels when somebody has given him a puppy dog for his very own! I think that I made a better impression, when I finally kept my appointment, because of that feeling. I think that I felt stronger and healthier because of it. I almost think that the other people—the strangers who passed me by on the street—were aware of my happiness.

And so—because in my own case it has proven true—I can't help thinking that the little clerk was right. Rainy-weather clothes should be gay clothes—cheerful clothes! We shouldn't put on our oldest, saddest garments because the sky is hidden from us by storm clouds and there is a heavy wind and a chilling rain. We should wear a bit of brave color to offset the cheerlessness of the day.

Rainy weather happens every so often—it can't be avoided. Every so often we must have our unpleasant times. Sometimes the rainy weather is one of nature's stormy days and sometimes it's a rainy day of the spirit. Sometimes the rainy day comes in the form of a soul-stirring conflict—sometimes it comes in the shape of great trouble and stress and despair.

If it's one of nature's rainy days we do the natural thing—we get out storm clothes and umbrellas. And if it's one of the other kind of rainy days we do approximately the same thing. We get out those defences—mental and physical and spiritual—that we hope will protect us most efficiently from the storm.

Usually our rainy-day clothes are dark colored. For the most part the umbrellas that we carry, to ward off the sheets of gray water, are black ones. And the defences that we carry to protect us from the other rainy day are usually sober ones, of no particularly vivid hue. Oftentimes the very bravery of us is a sad-eyed, straight-lipped bravery! And—friends of mine—that isn't the best sort of bravery.

When it's raining—the real sort of rain—and we have to go out, away from the fireside and the easy chair, let's make our rainy-day clothes as cheerful as possible. Let's carry a bright umbrella, or pin on a knot of ribbon, or tuck a flower into the lapel of our coats. And when we're meeting the other kind of a storm let's clothe our spirits, and our hearts, in the gayest of colors. Let's meet our rainy days with a smile and a snatch of song and a glad word!

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD New York

The Army of the "Down-and-Outs"

Down-and-Outs, we have a shelter awaiting us in which clothes and bodies may be dried.

But those white cards that were passed around at the mission—what were they, we keep asking ourselves. We go back Monday night to find out. A blank card is given to us. It was an application for membership in the Bowery Mission Brotherhood and concluded:

"I declare that it is my desire and determination, by the help of God, to live a good Christian life, and I ask that my name be enrolled as a member of the Bowery Mission Brotherhood. I promise to attend the meetings whenever possible and to take an active part in the work of the Mission. I also pledge myself to abstain from the use of all alcoholic drinks as a beverage."

Sunday night, out of the two hundred and more in the gathering, about thirty had signed these cards. At 7 o'clock Monday night these thirty will be welcomed at the Brotherhood meeting. Mr. Balevre, the leader, is away tonight, but Richard Wilson, one of the mission's converts, is in charge of the office, and again Mr. Goode is present, this time leading the meeting. Mr. Wilson is giving out membership cards to those who have stuck to their determination, as evidenced by their application, to join the Brotherhood.

The hollow-eyed youth I had observed the night before is among those who gets his membership card. I hear him speak of a job, and learn that he is one of a small number for whom work has been secured for Tuesday. The men are to distribute circulars for an uptown department store and to get $2 for the day's work.

There are more than thirty present for the Brotherhood meetings, which are held every night between 7 and 8, including men who have joined it in the past and who attend regularly.

In the front row is an excited little Italian, who is eager to explain that he lost his job as a hospital orderly because he was sick for a while, and when he got back it had been filled by a man who was going to stick to it. Hospital orderlies get $20 a month and their "keep." Three months ago, Salvation Army and Prison Reform Association officials told me that a job as a hospital orderly was procurable at any time, but that men would not accept it, or if they did, it was only to tide them over a week or a month. Now the jobs are snapped up, and are clung to desperately, for the orderly knows that if he gives up this work there is nothing else awaiting him.

At the back of the room a young fellow arises who betrays a foreign accent. None of the others are foreign in speech or accent or in appearance.

THE group is practically all-American. They will take jobs at $2 a day if they can get them, and no doubt at $1 a day, or at any price which will keep soul and body together without the dole of charity.

But, being native-born Americans, short of actual starvation forcing them into it, they are not easily employed, at any price, as strike-breakers. And many of them, I believe, would starve to death before they thus fought against their fellow workers—such is the spirit of even the most down-and-out of our native-born Americans.

What reason have I for thinking this? Reason enough, because Mr. Goode has asked them for suggestions how to relieve the unemployment situation, and the various replies show intelligence, conscientiousness and an inbred disposition to consider the interests of others as well as their own.

"I'll give you gentlemen about ten minutes in which to tell what's wrong with the country and how to settle it," announces Mr. Goode, and the answering smile on the faces of the men is all-American in its good-humored acceptance of this somewhat facetious pleasantry.

One young fellow from Illinois, he says, tells how he has read in a newspaper that if the non-irrigated lands out West were opened up by the Government it would give work to many men.

A man of fifty or so, well dressed, and apparently a clerical worker of some sort arises to tell of his recollection of "dry farming" in the Western states, where artesian wells, to supply water for humans and for the stock, do away with the necessity for land irrigation. His clothing is still presentable, but he is just as penniless as the rest.

Various bits of information began to be contributed by the men of conditions throughout the country, so far as they had encountered them, in regard to employment.

WHERE was the "bum"? Where was the man "too lazy to work"? Where was the man who wouldn't accept any but war wages?

Well, such men may still exist, but in the Bowery Mission they are conspicuous by their absence.

Every man in that Brotherhood meeting needed and was eager to get work. Mr. Goode assured me, from his trained observation, that there was not a genuine "bum" or an idler among them. So, if capital thinks that it is possible now for it to resume operations, I hope that its employment agents will call at the mission to add to its first quota of workers.

But my thirst for information was not yet satisfied. I wanted to see, for myself, the men who are sleeping out in the parks, and as the men filed out of the Brotherhood meeting I again caught sight of the little fellow with the hollow eyes, I ran after him.

"Sonny," I asked, "are you going to sleep out tonight?"

"Yes, ma'am," he answered. "I got a job for tomorrow, but tonight ain't got the money for a bed."

"I want you to take me around to a few of the places where the men are sleeping out," I breathlessly appealed. And then I turned to Mr. Goode for approval of this venture.

"You know this is a lady you are going out with?" he inquired of the lad.

"Yes, sir," was the prompt answer, and something in the tone completely satisfied Mr. Goode and myself that the boy was entirely dependable and all right. So it was arranged that after the meeting below, the young fellow was to conduct me personally to a few of the outdoor sleeping places of the Down-and-Outs.

We sat on the platform with the mission workers, the lad and I, all through the meeting, which I mention because later it took on a certain significance.

Just before the meeting ended, we left the mission and, naturally, having thus deprived him of his chance for the coffee and bread, I took the youngster first to a restaurant. He was shy in his demeanor, but plied with questions craftily put in a casual tone, he threw off his reserve and before long, after he had eaten, he was talking "a blue streak," without any guidance or questioning.

HE HAD been born on Mulberry Street. His parents were Italian. His father is dead and his mother and his stepfather now live in New Jersey. He had lived with them, but had lost his job, and had had some words with the stepfather. So a girl he knew in Jersey City told him that he could get work there; he had taken her word for it, only to find there were no jobs, and in a few days he didn't have a cent, and was sleeping on the docks. So the police ran him out, and he came back to New York. Besides, he thought, maybe, that he could get work here that wouldn't be so heavy to do. The doctor had said that he ought not to do real heavy work for five years, on account of his lungs.

"What's the matter with your lungs?" I asked.

"Nothin' much—I ain't got the T. B.," he assured me, "but I got gassed so many times it left me kind of bad there."

This was the first intimation I had had that the boy was an ex-service man. He is actually twenty-two years old, he told me, although he looks much younger. He had been with a New Jersey regiment made up mostly of the Italian-born or those of Italian parentage.

The Mystery of a grain of wheat

A kernel of wheat contains over 125 million food cells. All those food cells should be broken to easily digest.

Whole wheat supplies 16 needed elements. It forms almost a complete food. It supplies some elements which most other foods lack.

Prof. Anderson's Idea

Ordinary cooking breaks only part of the food cells. So Prof. Anderson invented this process:

He seals the grains in guns, and submits them to an hour of fearful heat. The moisture in each food cell is thus changed to steam.

Then he shoots the gun and the steam explodes. Thus 125 million steam explosions occur in every kernel.

Every food cell is blasted, so digestion is made easy and complete.

Puffed to Bubbles

The grains come out as bubbles eight times normal size. They are flimsy, flavory, toasted. No cereal food was ever more delightful.

Thus Puffed Wheat means whole wheat made tempting, and easy to digest.

Now millions of children get whole-grain foods in the form of Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice. They enjoy them in a dozen ways, morning, noon and night.

The cereal dish has new enjoyments, and children are better fed.

Puffed Wheat

Airy whole grains, toasted and crisp, to serve in every bowl of milk. An ideal bedtime dish.

Puffed Rice

Thin, flimsy globules, with a taste like toasted nuts. The finest breakfast dainty. Serve with cream and sugar. Mix in every dish of fruit.

"She Makes Perfectly Wonderful Angel Cakes"

You know women who do, but there are a very few of them, aren't there? In every neighborhood there are a few women who are known for the cakes they make—those light, fluffy, delicious cakes that seem to melt in your mouth. They never seem to have any trouble with them—their cakes are always the same and always good.

It Isn't a Gift—It's Just Knowing How

The few good cake makers you know have learned by experience. They do certain things that get results but they have never analyzed their methods so that they can tell you just what they do. I learned to make cakes in my own kitchen and I spent a good many years in experimenting and reducing to a simple system the things that I found out about cake making. Now, I have put these simple facts into a book that will make any woman a good cake maker.

You can be the Best Cake Maker in Your Neighborhood

It isn't difficult. I have put everything down in such a simple form that a few minutes study will reveal to you the whole secret of baking delicious, good looking cakes. You will be surprised to find how little effort will be required to turn out a cake that will be the envy of your neighborhood. You know the hours that you have spent in your kitchen and the tears you have shed over unsuccessful efforts. Those weary hours are a thing of the past, because with my wonderful cake making system, every cake you attempt will be a complete success.

Get My Splendid Cake Making System

It describes how to make those cakes that you have considered particularly difficult in the past, Angel Food, Devil's Food, Puff Cake and others. My Mahogany Cake is an improved Devil's cake and it is wonderfully tempting when served. Every little detail has been carefully explained. You are instructed in the proper materials to use—how to mix them, how long to stir, the proper baking heat to start your cake, how much and when to increase that heat, the tests to make for both frosting and cake—how to make superb icings that will not harden or crack. These, and many other things are explained so simply and easily that any novice can bake cakes that are equal to those of the finest cake baker you know. I have no secret preparations or special mixers or other cooking utensils to sell—I merely instruct you in the successful use of the materials now in your kitchen.

Make Your Cake Baking Pay You a Profit

Many women have found an additional source of income in their ability to make good cakes. Cakes of the better sort, made the Osborn way, are in demand for receptions, weddings, socials and other functions. You can sell your cakes at a handsome profit and you will be surprised to find how much it is possible for you to earn this way.

I Guarantee You will be Satisfied Your Money back if You Are Not

All of my cake making secrets are contained in a book carefully printed, with large easy-to-read type, of convenient size and arranged for easy reference at your work. Every page is packed with instructions that will be of inestimable value to you.

I have reduced the cost of this book to $2.00. I want you to see it and read it and I will guarantee that if you do not find that it lives up to my claims after you have had it in your home for five days, you may return the book and your money will be refunded.

Send me $2.00 today and your copy of this remarkable cake making system will be forwarded by return mail, post paid.

that you are an ex-service man?" I demanded.

"I don't mention it much," he replied, "because people, they think that maybe a fellow is bragging about it."

We went first to the all-night mission, where Anthony had slept one night. (That was his first name, he told me. His last name was Italian, which translated into English, means "Thanks to God." I will not give it here, because it does not seem right to identify him.)

At one mission a hard-faced man guarded the door. The meeting did not begin until 10. It lacked a few minutes of that hour. He said that after the meeting the men who didn't have beds could sleep on the benches all night, if they wanted to. I asked if they were given coffee and bread, but was told, with what I fancied was a trace of peevishness, that they had done that for a while, but that it is impossible now to feed everybody who needs to be fed.

"Of course, if a man is all right with God, we make a special effort in his case, and get him something to eat," he added looking hard at Anthony.

Well, I don't know about the charity of that, or even the justice, was the thought which I concealed. If in order to get some bread and coffee to keep myself from starving, I had to be "all right with God," according to the notion of this hard-faced man, a cog must have slipped somewhere in Christian charity.

Anthony had slept in this mission, also, for one night, but had not gone back, even when it rained, because "that fellow there at the door, he's pretty rough with the men. The night I was there, he threw a drunk right out on the sidewalk," he narrated, "and the rest of the men, they didn't like it."

WE WERE at City Hall Park, then. Although still early, there were many figures which had settled themselves down with the unmistakable design of spending the night there.

We took the car to Battery Park. Men were seated on the benches and huddled on the lawns, old newspapers serving as blankets, when spread out, and when crushed together, as pillows.

Several figures were stalking about, picking up pieces of newspaper here and there, until they got enough together for their "bed." One fellow, his "bed" already made, had not yet thrown himself upon it, but was sitting up, nursing his feet, from which he had removed his shoes.

"Got blisters on his feet," explained Anthony.

Then returning to the vicinity of City Hall my guide took me in back of the World Building to observe another "dormitory" of the Down-and-Outs. There are huge bales of paper there, under the bridge, and atop of them were dozens of hunched-up figures.

"The police run you out at six o'clock in the morning," Anthony informed me. "I slept there one night. It's warmer than out in the parks."

Union Square, and the little triangle in front of Cooper Union near the Bible House, these were the next places which Anthony took me to observe the Down-and-Outs. There were a few women among them, workhouse types, I imagined.

I AM afraid it is going to be a terribly hard winter," say the Bowery Mission Workers, to the visitor.

But to the men themselves, they try to appear quite cheerful.

"Keep a-smiling, boys, and it'll all pass over," urges Brother Goode.

I have an idea, however, that Brother Goode is drawing upon his faith in Providence, when he makes that statement.

This article by Mrs. Wilkie is reprinted from the Brooklyn Standard Union through the courtesy of that newspaper. It reflects vividly the problem that faces the Bowery Mission this winter and indicates the need of funds to carry on the work. The Mission will gratefully receive your contribution.

and was especially happy in Sabbath-school hymns to be sung by infant classes and at anniversary meetings and so forth. The touching lyric—had appeared in a selection of juvenile poems for the use of nursery and infant school.

"I am a happy Little Lamb Browsing in pastures green."

She likewise "wrote for the press" along more dignified lines. "Scribbles by the Way" figured in suburban papers, and now and then the religious press contributed to her reputation by publishing story, or sketch, or poem.

Altogether it was no insignificant personage who took a cup of afternoon tea at the Parsonage one day when two young girls who were "great cronies" of their pastor's wife chanced to be calling with accounts of a flower show they had attended, and from which they had brought bouquets for both Mr. and Mrs. Haile.

"Dear girls!" the hostess said delightedly and affectionately. "It frightens me to think what criminal prices you were forced to pay for these beauties"—spreading them out upon the table for closer inspection. "I am going to trouble you still more by making you arrange those for Mr. Haile's study in the very prettiest vase he has—one that was given to him by my Bible Class at Christmas, years ago. No!"—as they began the task—"choose the very prettiest for him. Those were never meant for me—and you know it as well as I do, you rogues!"

MISS BRIGGS struck in there! She had swallowed her second cup of tea and felt playful.

"Dear Mrs. Haile! you can't mean that or you would not treat it so lightly. You would be jealous of the favoritism shown your lord and master."

"Not a bit of it!" came so heartily as to carry conviction to the most suspicious. "These dear children don't need to be told that the more they love him, the better I love them, and the higher is my esteem of their excellent sense and right judgment."

Miss Briggs shook her head and pursed her lips, but forbore to express further misgivings until the laughing girls had kissed Mrs. Haile "good-bye" with a supplementary hug, and the maid had cleared away the tea equipage. When the decks were being cleared for action, she prepared her battery.

The "Banner Punch" had more than once described her as "fair." She owned to being on the shady side of thirty and plump, had been a blonde in early life and held fast to the title. The large blue eyes that were her best feature began to show faint lines of a paler blue around the iris. The straw-colored locks that helped to establish her claim to fairness were abundant and were kept free from tell-tale gray strands by vigilant weeding. The figure, encased in black silk that "fitted like her skin" to borrow a homely and expressive phrase, did not falsify obesity that transcended plumpness. To do her justice, she bore her loss gallantly, neither waddling in walking, nor slumping in sitting. When it was practicable and convenient she sat in a chair or sofa of medium height and propped small feet clad in tasteful shoes or boots upon a cushion or hassock. Thus ensconced in a straight-backed armchair that fitted her easily she entered upon the matter that engaged her poetic mind.

"My dear Mrs. Haile! I can not sufficiently admire the inimitable tact with which you parry shafts that must sometimes find a weak spot in your armor, although it is of the finest proof. There are not many ministers' wives who do not have cause to ward off such thrusts, but few have occasion for so much address and self-control as you are blessed with. For Mr. Haile is what is known as a 'many-sided man' and women make fools of themselves over such. He appeals to the finest sensibilities of our nature and attracts us irresistibly to confide in him. He must have an immense correspondence, for

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address, on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address Financial Department. The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2, describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To Invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co. 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent. are described in Circular 28.

Deere & Co., 10-year gold notes to yield 8.40%. Business, farm mortgages. Founded by John Deere in 1837. Ask for circular No. 51.

Circular No. 50 gives complete information on Federal Farm Loan Bonds. They pay 5% and are tax exempt.

Farm Mortgages—details also circulars regarding 6 per cent. First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Send for Circular 38.

Foreign Bonds—opportunities for obtaining Foreign Municipal Bonds with yearly drawings at par giving high average yield of 12 1/4 per cent.—Danish Internal Loans, Norwegian and Scandinavian Bonds. Booklet 48.

Bonds—questions answered, terms defined. A very valuable non-technical booklet that every prospective bond buyer should have. No. 42.

Selecting Your Investments, Strong Box Investments, Creating Good Investments, are three booklets describing the service and safe, high yield investments of a nationally known investment house. No. 43.

STRONGER WITH AGE

6% Prudence-Bonds actually grow stronger with age, for while the first mortgages behind them are being periodically reduced by serial payments, the properties themselves remain pledged in their entirety till the mortgages are discharged. Thus, as the mortgages grow less, the equities grow bigger and the Bonds grow stronger. In addition, each Bond is guaranteed by endorsement as to both principal and interest.

instance, with women who recognize in him a born physician, not of souls merely in the ordinary acceptance of the term, but of hurts of whatsoever kind to heart and sensibilities?"

IN REPORTORIAL jargon, as she "paused for a reply," Mrs. Haile was gazing at her—could it be in unmixed amusement?

"I beg your pardon!" she said slowly, her smile more apparent as she went on. "I do not quite grasp your meaning. If you imply that Mr. Haile has many letters from parishioners who desire advice in matters pertaining to the welfare of the soul, it is very likely that you are right. As you must comprehend, clergymen, like physicians, are bound in honor and by the rules of their respective professions to guard these sacredly. I could not respect a man of either profession who told his wife or mother or dearest friends anything that was imparted to him professionally."

"Am I to understand then that you do not see your husband's mail before or after he opens it?" I know at least one clergyman's wife who opens his letters, reads them and then passes over to him those which she thinks would interest him. She told me this, in his presence. He confirmed her assertion that "it saved him no end of annoyance."

"I would not believe that man or that woman under oath," cried the other woman. "Nor can I think that they told you the truth."

"They are dear friends of mine, and responsible for all they say!" retorted Miss Briggs, fiercely. "Each has confidence in the other. But, I didn't mean to excite you. I came here today with the conviction hanging like a thorn in my mind that I ought to explain to you that out of the depth of soul conflicts such as I pray Heaven you may never know, I have written repeatedly to Mr. Haile, sometimes asking for a personal interview, sometimes pouring out the bitterness of my soul on paper. I called at the Church House on my way, in the hope of finding him there and telling him what weighed upon my conscience. He was not in and that odious Miller wanted to know 'if he could do anything for me?' He thought I might find Mr. Haile at home. The maid says he is not!"

"He is not at home." Mrs. Haile said it with quiet dignity that for some reason provoked the poetess laureate to plainer speech.

"Perhaps all this is a thrice-told tale to you. Mr. Haile has not made a professional secret of my spiritual maladies?"

"He has never told me that you have ever written a line to him, or that you have consulted him professionally. I am sorry you had need of his services in such circumstances, and glad if he has relieved you in any way."

Albertha eyed her suspiciously: "Had you read every letter, Mrs. Haile, you would have had evidence that I at least am no liar when I declare that nothing could be more innocent than my intimacy with your husband, who is my spiritual director."

ANITA repressed with difficulty the inclination to shout with laughter, then choked back a wave of impatient anger.

"Do you imagine for a moment, Miss Briggs, that I have lived with him for all years and require that you shall assure me of that?"

Albertha dabbed the big blue eyes with a lace-edged handkerchief and began to sob, but artistically.

"Dear Mrs. Haile! bear with me for a little while! Yours is such a goodly heritage that you can not conceive of what I have to suffer from loneliness and heart-famine. There is not a heart upon earth that throbs responsively with mine. Do not grudge me the crumbs that fall from your bountiful table!"

The round face went clean out of sight behind the cambric shield.

"I did not mean to be unkind"—voice and face softening at the signs of real distress. "I am thankful that my husband has been able to be of service to you. He has the kindest heart in the world, and his mission is to the afflicted and lonely-hearted. Nothing was further from my thoughts than to wound you, or to object to his conscientious performance of duty."

It was not the right thing to say, and she felt this before the sentence was half-finished, but nothing more apt came to her lips.

Albertha crammed the handkerchief back into her bag.

"I will not detain you longer from more congenial occupations and society. I must apologize for my long visitation."

The ever inopportune telephone rang sharply at the far end of the library in which they were sitting. Miss Briggs arose fustily.

"Don't let me keep you one second longer! Good afternoon and thank you for your hospitality!"

On her way to the hall she met the maid with a double handful of mail just delivered by the postman. The retreating visitor saw what the girl did not notice, that she had dropped one letter upon the hall-floor, and stopped to pick it up just as Mrs. Haile replied to the telephone summons. At a glance Miss Briggs recognized the handwriting upon the envelope addressed to "Mr. Stuart Haile." She was clutching it when she said to herself upon the porch where another woman had paused in the same spot to say the same words a week before:

"This is providential!"—and on gaining the street—"How lucky that she did not add the 'Reverend'!"

ANITA had finished giving her orders for the day, and was on her way to the second-story sitting-room next morning when the early mail arrived. She carried it up-stairs and sat down in the bay-window to sort it after lifting the lid of the Wardian case over which the sunbeams were beginning to creep, and for the hundredth time she had reminded herself that unobstructed sunshine is not good for a fernery—nor for the human soul. At the very bottom of the heap of letters was one addressed in Mrs. King's handwriting to "Mrs. Stuart Haile."

"I saw her yesterday. What can she have to say to me today!" she mused in breaking the familiar seal.

The letter bore the date of the preceding day!

"Best and wisest of friends" (it began, and the reader smiled affectionately in reading it).

"A letter just received gives me the information that Rupert's term of absence will be prolonged by a trip to California, which may keep the wanderer away for a month longer. This will give me time for mature reflection and to rally my forces for whatever the future may have in store for me. God help me!"

The reader let fall the sheet at the end of the first paragraph.

"What does it mean? This was never intended for me." She looked at the signature "S. E. K." and then at the heading of the first page, undeniably from Mrs. King. Perhaps a line or two more would throw light on the puzzle.

"As you may suppose, I am as sadly in need of pastoral and brotherly counsel as ever. Am I asking too much in requesting that you to call this evening? I am half wild with doubts and dreads."

What We Know About God

E. L., C. E., B. Y. P. U. Psa. 139: 1-12

THE Psalmist says, "O Lord, thou hast searched me and known me, thou knowest my downsitting and my uprising; thou understandest my thought afar off."

Down to the very end of the one hundred and thirty-ninth psalm the author speaks in this wise. The Psalmist knew that God knew him. That is one thing we know about God. He is all-wise. Nothing escapes the God-eye. That eye is all-seeing. The scrutiny of God is searching, keen, analytical.

It is not a pleasing picture of God the Psalmist paints, because it is not comforting. God is not a celestial detective, a divine policeman, the sort of a God that causes us to shrink from Him. That is the pagan, the heathen, the unregenerate view of God. Perhaps it served its purpose in the olden days when the appeal to fear won converts to the throne, but we have a sublimer, more lovely, more comforting interpretation of God as given to us in the perfect revelation of Jesus Christ. True, God is all-seeing, all-wise, all-beholding. True it is also, "God is love." God is not like love. Love is not like God. "God is love." God is our Father. God pities in a Fatherly way. God is our Comforter. God comforts like a mother. As the child, in confidence and trusting, can go to its parents and pour out its heart, so can the child of God go to the Fatherly and Motherly heart of God and pray for guidance and peace.

Aside from the picture of God that Jesus Christ has given us, we find nothing better than the interpretation of God as given us by Isaiah in the fortieth chapter of his book. Here again we have a picture of God as a comforter, a bit of sublime literature for this bewildered age and a sermon for these distracting times. Jesus said, "He that hath seen me, hath seen the Father." Let us look long and earnestly at Jesus Christ. "They looked unto Him and were lightened."

"They looked unto Him and were radiant," the Revised Version translates. Radiant. Made light. Not light in opposition to heavy, but light in opposition to dark. They looked unto Him and were brightened, resplendent, glorious. The nations light the lamps of their thinking by the Eternal Light and they themselves become luminous. This is the Christian life, a life represented by looking. It is looking for help, pardon, inspiration, power. "Look unto me and be ye saved, all the end of the earth." "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world." It is so much easier to overlook than to look, so much easier to look than to see. Therefore let us fix our gaze, focus our glance, rivet our attention, looking not to self, but to him, not within, but without, "looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith." Seeing Jesus, we see God. Knowing Jesus, we know God. Knowing God as love, the love incarnated in Jesus, our conception of God shall be more intelligent and our conduct more efficient as Christians as we in turn light up the darkness of the world with the flame of love that always wins.

THE International Women Preachers' Association, organized in St. Louis a year ago, has been growing rapidly and already fifteen denominations are represented in its membership. Its objects are to secure ecclesiastical rights for women and to encourage young women to take up careers as ministers. At its first annual meeting, held recently in Chicago, the following officers were elected: President, Miss M. Madeline Southard, Winfield, Kansas; Vice-President-at-large, Rev. Etta Sadler Shaw, Grand Rapids, Michigan; Recording Secretary, Miss Lida Herrick, University Place, Nebraska; Treasurer, Mrs. Ella L. Kroft, Indianapolis, Indiana; Auditor, Rev. Mary H. Sibbitt, Wichita, Kansas.

Paul's Last Journey to Jerusalem

International Sunday-School Lesson for October 23

Acts 20:1 to 21:17

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

PREACHING is very important work, but more souls are won to Jesus Christ during pastoral visitation. As the third journey of Paul was drawing to a close, he was able to visit many churches which had been established in the preceding years. The journey from Ephesus to Corinth and then back to Jerusalem by the long route was the last one during which he could determine his own movements. At Jerusalem he became a prisoner and remained one till his death, except for the little while that intervened between the first and second imprisonments at Rome. No man could have put forth more service and shown less of self-interest than did Paul as we now go with him from Achaia to Palestine. He began with a plot laid against him and concluded as a prisoner in the Castle of Antonio in Jerusalem.

To avoid the trap laid by certain Jews, the seven worthy co-travelers were sent ahead by sea to the rendezvous at Troas and Paul went overland. At Philippi Dr. Luke rejoined Paul and continued with him for many months. There is an intimation in II Corinthians that Paul needed his personal physician once more; he surely did during the long imprisonments that followed. We know that Luke was once more with Paul because of the reappearance of the "we" passages, 20:6, Luke being the author of Acts. You are referred to another help book written by A. T. Robertson, D. D., "Luke the Historian in the Light of Research." This is among the very best of the more than twenty books written by Dr. Robertson. This book is valuable in studying the Gospel of Luke as well as Acts.

Acts twenty should be studied closely as well as the portion indicated in the twenty-first chapter. Paul had hoped to be at Jerusalem by the Passover; but instead that feast time was spent at Philippi. He will, however, reach Jerusalem by Pentecost, fifty days after the feast of unleavened bread. By the blessing of God there had been wonderful results since the Macedonian Call was obeyed, when at Troas on the second journey, and seven days were spent in that city on this occasion. Withal, Paul did not seem able to finish all he wanted to say to the brethren, and on the last night he spoke till midnight, and then even to break of day. Those who snap the watch at the preacher before thirty minutes are up should be thankful that they live in the present generation. It was not the dullness of the heart-throbbing message which caused Eutychus to fall asleep while sitting in that third-story window. Though dead when the disturbed congregation picked him up, life was quickly restored to the body by God at the entreaty of Paul. You will find a similar miracle in studying the lives of both Elijah and Elisha. Everywhere along the itinerary Paul was delivering a farewell message to his children in the faith.

THE paragraph which begins with verse thirteen must be read with the map before you, as should be done with the entire lesson. In those days a twenty-mile walk was taken by choice—Troas to Assos. There is an excess of Sunday trolley-car riding in these days, even in going to church, whereas a little more exercise would be better for the body.

Ephesus and the beloved brethren there were dear to Paul, after having spent three years in that city. It would have been a joy to hold another session, however brief, in the School of Tyrannus, but now the objective was Jerusalem by Pentecost. A stop was made at Miletus long enough to send for the Ephesian elders, twenty-five miles away. They came eagerly at Paul's invitation, and the great preacher and pastor was enabled to give another of his masterly addresses. Few discourses in the Bible are richer in teaching or pathos. Few in a congregation appreciate the fervent love that a pastor has for each member. In even a three years' ministry, unnumbered hours have been spent in prayer for individuals, while the direct labor has been continuous. To give a farewell is all but heart-breaking to the under-shepherd.

It was necessary for Paul to have done his work well in order to be able to address the observers of his ministry in the manner recorded by Luke, who was present. The "whole counsel of God" has been expounded to them. They were now, in turn, to become overseers under the direction and power of the same Holy Spirit. Note the special value in this address in that Paul gave the world an otherwise unrecorded message spoken by Jesus Christ—"It is more blessed to give than to receive." Paul had been a true example of this Christian teaching, and now he could quote it in their presence with unblushing countenance. Then came that final powerful prayer as all knelt on the sand. A very gentle touch is given when it is recorded that as the Ephesians wept and embraced Paul they also kissed him. He deserved every honorable token of affection that they could give him.

DOWN through the Aegean Sea they went and out into the Great Sea, the Mediterranean. As they sailed by Cyprus, Paul had much to tell the eight companions about that first missionary journey and the experiences at Salamis and Paphos. Doubtless Paul spoke feelingly concerning John Mark, and all joined in prayer that the work of Barnabas and Mark on Cyprus might be abundantly rich through the blessing of the Triune God. At Tyre kind friends sought to restrain Paul from going to Jerusalem, because they knew, through the Holy Spirit, that persecutions awaited him if he went there. This fact did not hold Paul from his own purpose, and they just concluded the matter with another beach prayer-meeting before farewells were spoken.

A fascinating touch in the description here is the statement that children were in this family group by the boat-side. The gospel of Jesus Christ is the teaching which makes mankind give to women and children their full and rightful place in society. Without the influence of the gospel, womanhood is akin to serfdom, and children are bartered for trifles. The fact is also too true that if Christians valued women and children more, they would contribute more for their freedom and uplift in non-Christian lands. Real sentiment is costly. Paul found this to be true, both as he had love for his Lord and for those whom his Lord would have saved.

After Ptolemais came Caesarea and a most hearty welcome in the home of Deacon Philip. It is not necessary to have one's deeds recorded that they may be worth while. Philip had been busy evangelizing ever since the Spirit separated him from the eunuch at Gaza, though no reference is found in Acts to his further work. Philip's daughters were also Christian teachers. This fact should be noted in connection with Paul's teaching about women in I Cor. 11:2-15, having in mind that the hatless women in Corinth were the well-known habitues of the Venus temple there.

Agabus also told Paul that bonds awaited him at Jerusalem, and did this by means of an acted parable. Trouble and hardship do not deter one with a mission such as Paul had. Among other things he must deliver there the offering which had been made for the poor Jews by the Jews and Gentiles in the cities visited by Paul. Thus the evangelist would keep faith with the accepted decision of the Council of Jerusalem made about eight years earlier. Paul's friends were more friendly to him when they declared "The will of the Lord be done," than when they sought to deter him from going forward in the path of his recognized duty.

The Old Shoemaker Who Advised David Lloyd George

YOU read a speech of David Lloyd George and you say:

"How did he learn to think so clearly and express himself with such power? What college did he attend?"

His college was the cobbler shop in a little village in Wales; his teachers were his uncle, the cobbler—and a few really worth-while books.

It was those books, wisely selected for him and systematically read, that gave Lloyd George his start.

Think of this. You have probably read more books than Lloyd George ever saw in his early years. Yet your reading has given you only a smattering of knowledge; while his reading gave him the richest gift in the world—the power to think clearly and to express himself well.

Why not decide to-day to stop wasting your reading hours? Why not say:

"From now on I will read only the books that will build me into a more successful man or woman; the books that have proved their building power in other lives."

You can do it; if you will. You need not wander aimlessly among the 4,500,000 books that have been printed. Your reading problem has been solved; the solution is contained in a free booklet which every ambitious man and woman should own. It is called "Fifteen Minutes a Day" and tells the whole story of

Dr. Eliot's Five-Foot Shelf of Books

The Fascinating Path to a Liberal Education

Every well-informed man and woman should at least know something about this famous library.

The free book tells about it—how Dr. Eliot has put into his Five-Foot Shelf "the essentials of a liberal education," how he has so arranged it that even "fifteen minutes a day" are enough; how in pleasant moments of spare time, by using the reading courses Dr. Eliot has provided for you, you can get the knowledge of literature and life, the culture, the broad viewpoint that every university strives to give.

"For me," wrote one man who had sent in the coupon, "your little free book meant a big step forward, and it showed me besides the way to a vast new world of pleasure."

Every reader of the CHRISTIAN HERALD is invited to have a copy of this handsome and entertaining little book. It is free, will be sent by mail, and involves no obligation of any sort. Merely clip the coupon and mail it to-day.

Questions and Answers

SEVERAL Readers. The question of the authenticity and accuracy of the earliest New Testament manuscripts is discussed in an article in the New York Sun, in which it is shown, on the authority of a well informed Bible scholar, Professor C. M. Coburn, of Allegheny College, that "new discoveries have proved beyond doubt that the New Testament text was transmitted with remarkable accuracy and scrupulousness, so that it can be trusted more confidently than any other ancient record." The present generation of archeologists had examined and compared thousands of manuscripts, chiefly papyri, some of which are older than any known to scholars before the present generation. Forty years ago, no scholar had ever read a manuscript written during the lifetime of Jesus, in the language commonly spoken and written during that era. No New Testament manuscript known was older than the fourth century A. D. Now, we have many fragments of ancient New Testament, written on papyrus between the third and sixth centuries, some of them a hundred years earlier than any previously known, and these are declared by competent scholars to be in every essential exactly like our own New Testament of today. Professor Coburn points out that there is but one theology in these early Christian documents, which embraces the deity of Jesus, His virgin birth, His pre-existence and His Atonement on Calvary for the sins of the world—in fact, all the essentials of the Christian faith, as we know them today.

M. J. W., Santa Barbara, Calif. The portion of Matt. 19:15-35, relative to the treatment of wilful and persistent offenders who refuse all friendly overtures at amendment and reconciliation, is not interpreted as counselling the injured brother to go to law, but rather to make a sincere effort to heal the breach through personally making friendly advances; then, if these fail, through the mediation of the church, and if that also fails, then to let the offender severely alone. See Rom. 16:17; II Thess. 3:6; and II John 10.

H. C. H., Camp Jackson, S. C. No such interpretation as your friend suggests can be put upon the record. The promise to the aged priest does not admit of such a construction.

L. Washington, writes: "How were the pyramids built? Isn't it thought that the Israelites, while in captivity in Egypt, built them? In the Bible it is stated that the chosen people were under taskmasters, who required them to make brick with straw?"

There are, or were, some seventy pyramids in Egypt, mainly masses of stone or brick. They are believed to be chiefly the tombs of monarchs of the fourth to the twelfth dynasties, and the larger number are in the districts of Memphis and Gizeh, the later kings being buried at Abydos and Thebes, in tombs of a quite different construction. The Great Pyramid—the sepulchre of Cheops and probably the oldest—is believed to have been built about B. C. 2318-2186; the second pyramid, that of Chephren, B. C. 2186-2163, and the third, that of Mencheres, a brother of Chephren, B. C. 2163-2130. Joseph was sold into Egypt (according to the Oxford University calculations) about 1728 B. C. Jacob and all his following came into Egypt about 1706 B. C. The oppression of the Israelites in Egypt began about 1625 B. C. (Auchincloss says B. C. 1621) and the Exodus took place 1491 B. C. Doubtless the Israelites built pyramids during their bondage in Egypt, but all the great pyramids that form so picturesque a feature in Egyptian history were constructed centuries before. (The dates given above are those of the Oxford University, the International Workers' Bible, and Dr. W. S. Auchincloss' Chronology.)

We have information of a very worthy Christian family in a Western state, who, owing to crop failures, are likely to lose their home. Any interested reader who may be disposed to help them, can learn particulars by addressing "Friend in Need," Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

R. M., Chillicothe, O. Christianity is a religion of joy, and not of sadness, as some mistakenly imagine. A gloomy Christian is the poorest kind of publicity agent for the Gospel of Jesus Christ. The sunniest-faced, happiest and most companionable men and women we know are good Christian folks, who are doing God's work here on earth bravely and successfully. Get in touch with some active practical Christian worker, and he or she will lead you into ways of usefulness, and you will find them ways of pleasantness and peace. An idle Christian has a one-sided experience and needs to get busy. See John 15:11; 16:22 and 24; Acts 13:52; Rom. 14:17; 15:13 and 32; Gal. 5:22; Phil. 2:2; I Thess. 3:9; I Pet. 1:8, and many other passages.

"PROPHECY EXPLAINED"

Dr. Patch Tells How He Wrote the Book

THE author, who has spent the better part of a lifetime in the study of Prophecy, has always been an active and devoted church member. For many years he has been impressed with the need of a system of prophetic studies which would combine thoroughness with simplicity. Familiar with the work of all of the foremost expositors, dead and living, as his book itself shows, his research along prophetic lines has led to interpretations where others have not even penetrated. These interpretations or conclusions will be welcomed by all who love God's Word, and the more so as the author, with fine skill and scholarship, supports every one of his interpretations with the Word itself. Thus the Bible becomes its own interpreter and new force is given to the command to "Search the Scriptures."

In a letter dated September 7, to the Christian Herald, the author says:

"A class of young people of high school age, after completing a course in Bible history, asked me if they could not have a course in Prophecy. I said: 'Yes. I do not know of any suitable published course, but if we can not find one we will make one.'

"The teacher of an adult class in a university town in California, learning of this, asked for copies of the lessons. The class adopted them for study.

The president and some of the members of this class were about eighty years of age.

"These lessons, therefore, seem equally well adapted to young people and older people. Many members of these classes suggested the publication of the lessons in a complete book. They were revised and condensed into fifty-two lessons, and this book is the result.

"Many young people seem to weary of the monotonous sameness of the make-up of the regular Sunday School lessons and lose interest, often dropping out of the school on this account. A Course so different, and offering deeper and more advanced study, like this study of Prophecy, will prove to be a blessing to such.

"The study of fulfilled Prophecy can hardly fail to create, or increase, respect for the Bible, and give convincing proof of its inspiration. I know of nothing better to counteract the tendency toward destructive criticism than this."

While writing "Prophecy Explained," the author had two objects in view: he desired, first of all, to give the Bible's own teaching on the Prophecies—those already fulfilled, those in process of fulfilment, and those to be fulfilled in the future. He knew that the Church as a whole had become apathetic in regard to prophetic subjects and that the ministry had relegated them to the realm of things unsolvable, forgetful of the fact that in both the Jewish and the early Christian churches the study of Prophecy was held as of highest importance. To reawaken the interest in that long neglected study was his great desire. Where now but a small minority of professing Christians know even the bare outlines of Prophecy, he believes that, rightly presented, it would command the earnest attention of multitudes and would bring into their lives a new and powerful inspiration, and an experience nobler and more spiritually elevating than they could ever have conceived.

With this end in view he has put the outcome of his years of reverent study into this single volume, which covers the whole field of Prophecy and clears away all difficulties in a manner that appeals to the reader.

The book is a series of 52 studies. It is so planned as to be available either for the individual reader in the quietude of his home, for the Family Circle, or for the class in Church or Sunday School.

We submitted the manuscript to leading Bible teachers and it has received their heartiest commendation.

1 Vol. 12mo. Cloth (size, 7½x5 inches) 400 Pages of Large Type

When Jesus was on earth He expounded in all the Scriptures the things concerning Himself and the plan for man's redemption. Following this plan, the author of "Prophecy Explained" has emphasized this divine exposition at each successive prophetic stage, shedding a new light upon the sacred pages by which every reader can trace the "scarlet thread of Prophecy" from Genesis to Malachi, and from Matthew to Revelation.

That we of today are living in a time of prophetic fulfilment is generally conceded by all the leading students of the Word. Unfortunately, it is an age singularly marked by spiritual blindness. The people need to be enlightened, and here is the opportunity at hand in this timely volume. Reading it, one can not fail to be convinced that God is a loving and forgiving Father, who takes no pleasure in the death of the wicked; that there is a future for this earth when redeemed and purified, and that it will yet fulfil the destiny for which it was created; and that the Kingdom of which Jesus is the Sovereign is to be a perpetual Kingdom. You will find these and many other things presented in this book in a way you had never dreamed of, yet which you will feel convinced is absolutely in harmony with Scripture.

Covers the whole field of Prophecy and clears away all difficulties

"This excellent book appears opportunely at a time when, more than in any previous period in modern history, Prophecy is uppermost in the minds of thoughtful men and women throughout the world. This is a wonderful book on Prophecy. It will be welcomed by Christian men and women everywhere. It brings solace and consolation and reassurance.

"Mr. Patch has shed a flood of light on prophecy and especially on Revelation. His work cannot fail to be commended by Bible students and Christian people wherever the Bible is read and studied. It is the most important book we have ever published on Prophecy."—Dr. George H. Sandison.

A Suit that Never Breaks Faith— of Good Old Clothcraft Serge

MEN are certainly buying closely these days—they must feel sure their new suit, for instance, has more wear and good-looks-value than for seasons past.

In a way, this accounts for the tremendous sale of Clothcraft Serge Specials throughout the country at a time when many men are giving up their quest for old-time suit value as hopeless.

For you play safe with that good old Clothcraft Serge. It's the best suit material you've ever worn. And why? Simply because Clothcraft Serge is made of finest balanced worsted yarns, woven more compactly than in other fabrics. To this natural fibre-strength is added a series of compressions on the finished cloth which increases its compactness, solidity and wearing strength.

No wonder it wears well! No wonder it keeps its crease! No wonder it gives such a long life of good looks! Go behind the scenes in the Clothcraft Plant and you will find additional reasons for the wonderful value in the Clothcraft Serge Specials.

There you'll discover that Clothcraft has ceased making the fads and frills of men's clothing, and has concentrated on the making of only a few simplified models—the kind a sensible man prefers wearing. This obviates the extra production cost which the more effeminate men's styles always cause.

You'll discover there, too, that Clothcraft has invented many ingenious short-cuts to better clothes-making, and these also help in the task of making the Clothcraft Serge Special "a suit that never breaks faith."

You'll discover, also, that Clothcraft's enormous volume of production permits large quantity buying—and this means lowest possible prices for raw materials. All these savings—which come to you in the form of better value at a lower price—account for the way in which the million or more wearers of Clothcraft Clothes come back to the representative retailers who sell Clothcraft, and say, "Yes, a suit of clothes—but it must be Clothcraft!"

Send for FREE samples. Actual samples of the Clothcraft Serges (brown, gray and blue) will be sent you FREE on request, in a little folder that will vitally interest you. Address The Joseph & Feiss Co., 2166 West 53d Street, Cleveland, Ohio.

Clothcraft Short-Cuts That Save for You

The ingenious short-cuts to better clothes-making, hinted at above, were developed by Clothcraft over a period of seventy-five years of constant effort. These short-cuts are in many cases unique. For instance, in stitching in the "telescope" in the turn-up of a sleeve, Clothcraft eliminates a complete operation by using a double needle. Again, in making buttonholes Clothcraft uses machines that not only cut the holes, but overcasts them and succeeds in making a stronger, more "finished" bit of work than hand labor can accomplish. The net result of these and the score of other savings made here and there throughout the Clothcraft Plant is not only better workmanship but better values for your pocketbook—at prices you can afford.

What Europe Thinks of the Conference

By WILLIAM MACDONALD

THE forthcoming disarmament conference at Washington has from the first attracted a good deal of attention throughout Europe. The details of the negotiations between the Department of State and the governments to which invitations were to be extended have been chronicled from day to day with unusual fullness in all the leading newspapers, and editorial comment has been frequent. For all its remoteness and aloofness, to which the press never fails to allude, the entrance of the United States once more into the field of international affairs has excited a lively interest, and it has seemed entirely fitting that that entrance should have for its object the reduction of armaments, the burden of whose financial weight presses heavily everywhere.

Whatever else Europe may think about American foreign policy, it is worth while noting that public opinion in every European country still expects America to do the beneficent and altruistic thing, and to throw its influence on the side of peace. Therein lies a great reservoir of fundamental good-will which the government at Washington will be wise not to forget. Noblesse oblige, as the French say, which may be freely translated as meaning that the greater the power, the greater the obligation. There is no mistaking the power, and there is no doubt whatever but that Europe feels that America has also an obligation.

Judging by the tone of the press, however, it seems apparent that no important results are as yet expected from the Washington conference. There are several weighty reasons for this attitude of friendly but persistent skepticism. For one thing, Europe has long since ceased to expect much good to come from international conferences of any sort. It has been surfeited with conferences for two and a half years—conferences which met with the announced purpose of settling some difficulty or other, straightening out some vexatious tangle, or putting an end to some useless and dangerous war, but which in fact have spent their time in listening to long reports and partisan speeches, in quarreling with the findings of expert commissions, in concocting new devices for keeping up the appearance of authority where no real authority existed, and which have ended by leaving the European imbroglio pretty much where it was before.

What reason, Europe asks, is there for supposing that the Washington conference, however high the purpose which President Harding and Secretary Hughes may have had in summoning it, will accomplish anything more useful? Will it not be dominated by the same baneful influences which have dominated every European assembly of the powers since the armistice of November, 1918; will it not fall inevitably into the same routine methods; and will it not be equally barren of results? Will it, in fact, prove to be anything more than one more meeting of diplomats of whose proceedings the indefatigable Carnegie Foundation at Washington or the World Peace Foundation at Boston will in due time publish a readable account?

WE all know how the people of the United States feel about the Conference on limitation of armaments, called for November 11 in Washington. Particularly, we know by the flood of endorsements coming to the Christian Herald office, how the churches of this country look to it for a settlement of some of the big international problems.

What does Europe think about it, however?

We can't settle the world's affairs by ourselves, nor can we obtain a real understanding of the problems to be solved until we understand something of the European psychology. That is what makes this article especially valuable. Dr. Macdonald has held chairs of history in several of the largest universities, is an author of note and has thorough knowledge of Europe gained as a journalist and special correspondent. He is recently back from an extended trip of investigation that carried him from the Atlantic to Poland and the Balkans.

TAKE the question of disarmament. It is generally assumed in Europe that the main issue which will be debated at Washington in November will be that of the curtailment of naval construction, and the stopping of the mad race for naval supremacy in which the United States, Great Britain and Japan are now engaged. Certainly, if this suicidal contest can be ended or even appreciably mitigated, the whole world will give thanks. But the only kind of disarmament in which continental Europe at the moment is deeply interested is military disarmament. Today, more than two years after the signature of the Treaty of Versailles, military budgets are bigger than ever, and nowhere do they show signs of being materially reduced. France, with the largest army in the world, is arming other powers which have no use for further armies except for aggression, and is talking and thinking of war.

The superiority of the British fleet over the fleets of all other European powers combined has for so long been a fact that Europe has come to accept it as a matter of course, and it is not on the whole greatly concerned as to whether that fleet is increased in large proportions or in small. What Europe wants is a way of getting rid of its swollen armies which are eating up its substance and keeping the continent and the world in peril. Will the Washington conference content itself with achieving the curtailment of naval programs, assuming that it will be able to accomplish even so much as that, or will it go further and devise some way of relieving Europe from the burden of militarism which hangs over it like a pall? Europe is frankly skeptical on that point.

THERE are other reasons for doubt. It would be hard to find many persons in Europe who really believe that Great Britain under any circumstances will consent to a material reduction of its naval strength. To the familiar arguments about the necessity of defence and the protection of colonies and trade routes, used for generations to uphold the British demand for a predominant navy, are now to be added others which arise from the peculiar situation at the moment in Europe.

The Golden Rule in a Small Business

A Seattle Experiment Which Has Proved Notably Successful

IT IS being recognized increasingly that business is a social enterprise, and that nothing is so fundamental to its future as personal interest and personal confidence between employers, employees and the public. The ideal of the Golden Rule, and the conviction that it is basic to sound management, has gripped the mind of the industrialist, although it has not yet made its way to the same extent with labor and the public. To bring this about as quickly as possible is a matter of the greatest importance, especially to the Church, since it is the teacher of the Golden Rule.

Discussion of the Golden Rule in business has been almost entirely from the point of view of large-scale industry, in which the vital relations between man and man tend to become impersonal and mechanistic. It is necessary that attention should be focused on these larger units, for if the principle does not work in them it will ultimately break down everywhere. But it is important also to consider that there are ten small business enterprises to one larger one, and that at least one-third of all workmen employed in the 250,000 factories in the United States are in plants employing fewer than one hundred men. In hundreds of towns and smaller cities all industries are on a small scale. In Boise, Idaho, for example there is but one industry of considerable size—a large saw-mill—yet labor in that city is organized in twenty-two trades with 1,700 members. Probably 90 per cent. of all stores and all workshops in small cities, towns and villages are in a small scale.

The significance of this fact to the operation of the Golden Rule is that in these small businesses it is possible to maintain Christian personal relations without great effort, except the effort to do justly, to love kindness and to walk humbly with God. In these numberless enterprises the old friendship between employer and employee, the passing of which in large scale industry is so much lamented, is still preserved and may be developed ideally.

THE significance of this came to me anew recently in Seattle in connection with a series of addresses and conferences with the Chamber of Commerce, ministers of the city and the Federation of Churches, on the subject of Christian Principles in Industry. In one of the conferences I met a business man, Mr. Clint W. Lee, owner and personal manager of a printing establishment, whose point of view and methods are strikingly like those of Mr. Arthur Nash of the A. Nash Company, Inc., Cincinnati. His experience is as important in its relation to the operation of the Golden Rule in a small plant, as that of Mr. Nash in a large plant.

Mr. Lee's experiment is best told in his own words, which he has given me the privilege of using. I desire only to call the attention of the reader in advance to certain important facts in the narrative. These are, first, that Mr. Lee began with the Christian spirit as did Arthur Nash; second, that he recognized the justice of sharing profits with his workmen; third, that he called them together and worked out details democratically; fourth, that he first paid living wages to the lower paid operatives, as did Mr. Nash; fifth, that the Golden Rule was applied also to the public, in the form of reasonable prices for work; sixth, that the plan worked with the same success as with the A. Nash Company, Inc., and that Mr. Lee's confidence in his men was not misplaced. Mr. Lee's final warning is of great importance, for the commercial spirit is likely to seize upon the principle of the Golden Rule without its spirit. Mr. Lee says:

"From early childhood I was taught that the real test of a Christian is whether or not he practices his profession in his daily life. Nearly fifty years have deepened this teaching into a settled conviction. To me there is no dividing line between things that are usually spoken of as secular and others that are called spiritual. The man who treats everyday affairs in an un-Christian way needs a new conception of Christianity. The class struggle in industry, with which we are all so familiar, has seemed to me to be so utterly wrong that for a long time I have been looking for a better way. I have talked to some people, and read of others, who have been making experiments in profit-sharing and other forms of co-operative effort, with varying degrees of success.

"About four years ago I decided to try profit-sharing in my own business. I own and operate a small job printing plant in Seattle, employing at the time I began the experiment some five or six persons, with a volume of business averaging $1,000 a month. The bulk of our production is high-grade commercial printing, with some specialty work, such as wedding stationery and holiday greeting cards. At first our profit-sharing plan included only two employees, but with the beginning of 1919 most of the permanent employees were included, and the results for the year were quite satisfactory to all concerned.

"BY JANUARY 1, 1920, the plan had become a policy rather than an experiment, and all permanent employees were included. Business continued to be good during the year, the volume having increased from $1,000 a month (in 1917) to $1,000 a week (in 1920). Thirty per cent. of the net income was allotted for the workers, and for the first half of the year it was distributed quarterly. On account of the necessary expense in preparing for our holiday trade during the summer, it was not possible to compute profits for the third quarter until the close of the year; but the distribution for the last half of the year was made as soon after January 1 as the footings could be made.

"Up to this time I had decided personally what per cent. of the amount distributed each employee should receive. In making the allotment I had taken several things into account—the length of time in employ, length of time necessary to learn the trade, responsibility of position, interest shown, etc. I tried to be fair and impartial in my judgment. It occurred to me, however, that it might be more satisfactory if the workers themselves decided how much each one should receive. Accordingly, without any one knowing of my purpose, I called them together and suggested that I had prepared ballots on which were written the names of the nine who were considered the permanent employees. In this small group, where all work together, of course every one is familiar with the work of all the others, and was competent, I felt, to render just judgment. Each one made out a complete ballot (without any consultation), the average was computed and the distribution was made on the basis of this vote.

"The total profits for the year received by the employees participating was $3,000 or an average of about $335 each. In this connection it may be of interest to state that with the exception of the errand boy, who receives $15 a week, no permanent employee—and there are several girls—receives less than eighteen dollars a week salary; and that the total received was enough so that every one found it necessary to make out a government income-tax report.

"In our effort to establish and maintain just and harmonious relations among ourselves, we have never overlooked the obligation we owe to our customers. During the period of high prices through which we have been passing we have never charged more for our product, and in many cases somewhat less than our competitors who turn out a similar grade of work.

"DURING December, 1910, and January, 1921, two representatives of the United Typothetae, the national organization of master printers, made a complete survey of the printing business in Seattle. Naturally I was somewhat curious to learn whether my profits, after deducting the 30 per cent. set aside for the employees, was equal to the average of those engaged in the same line of business. When the findings of these investigators was made public I was surprised, and also somewhat gratified, to find that my standing was far better than I had supposed. The figures showed that the group of printers doing commercial work had made a net profit of 6.9 per cent. on the cost of production, while mine was 20.1 per cent.—almost three times the average for my class.

"If I have given my customers as much and even more for their money than my competitors usually do—and I have; if I have paid the employees regular wages plus 30 per cent. of the net profits—and I have; if I still have a per cent. of profit much larger than the average concern doing business in the same city and under the same conditions—and the survey says I have; what is the explanation?

"In reply to this may I say that, in my judgment, there are several minor contributing reasons that have made this possible, but the one main reason for the good comparative showing the business has made, is because of the loyal and enthusiastic co-operation of the workers. This co-operation is their response to my efforts to make the Golden Rule effective in both the shop and the front office. Everybody feels that the success of the business is their success. What I have done in a small business, and others have done on a much larger scale, still others who have never tried it may do.

"By this I do not mean that everybody who tries profit-sharing in his business will be sure to find it profitable in dollars and cents. Indeed, if the motive behind the adoption of any plan for securing co-operation on the part of the employees is the making of larger profits for the employer, that scheme is foreordained to failure. But I have a profound conviction that under anything like normal conditions any business rendering a real service may be made satisfactory if the Golden Rule is adopted as its code of ethics, and an honest effort made to render this code effective in the spirit and with the motive intended by its great teacher, Jesus Christ."

It is the intention of the Christian Herald from time to time to publish personality articles of this character, illustrating by experience the efficacy of adopting Christian principles in business. The stories of other men of good works always are an inspiration.

Compensations

1. If the burden of the day's task is heavy, the weight of wrongdoing may be light.
2. If the cloud of financial difficulty is dark, the blessing of physical health may be your sunshine.
3. If you have both poverty and disease to meet, and death close by, there is still the everlasting life on which to set your hope.
4. If you are denied what the world calls physical beauty, you may still have the attractiveness of mental power.
5. If you have lost one from the family circle, the closing of it up may bring the rest of you together in nearer blessing and friendship.
6. If the world seems to be getting worse instead of better, the final victory is God's. And it is the final victory that counts.
7. If you are disappointed in your ambitions you need not be disappointed in your aims.
8. If you have sinned and come short of the glory of God, you have not come short of his forgiveness, if you repent.

A Story of a City Church

By MARION HARLAND

Illustrated by William C. McNulty

WHEN Stuart Haile came in to dinner, his wife met him with a serene countenance and maintained a cheerful mien throughout the evening meal, saying no word regarding the strange letter from Mrs. King which told that her husband's absence was to be prolonged and implored the minister to call at her home that evening. The meal over, Mrs. Haile let Stuart go to his study, in which he had said he would spend the evening, and stayed with the children until their bedtime. Having kissed them good night she repaired to the study and tapped for admittance.

Stuart looked up from his papers inquiringly. She laid the letter upon the table, and pointed to the address.

"This was evidently intended for you and directed by mistake to me. I read but six lines. Then I comprehended that there was a blunder. I am very sorry."

She was at the door when he recalled her.

"Come back, dear, and sit down here—drawing a chair closer to his own. "I am glad this has given me the opportunity for which I have longed for several days. This poor soul"—rapping the open letter before him—"is your friend as well as mine. I have told her more than once that you must be taken into our counsels. She believes that she ought to leave her husband. He is not actively abusive, although habitually cross and often querulous in speech and utterly out of sympathy with her in almost everything that she holds dear. There is no room for suspicion of marital infidelity—the one offence recognized by the laws of New York as legitimate grounds for divorce. If she decides to leave him she will have to take care of herself and in more senses than one. It can not be denied that the man has redeeming qualities. He is a good citizen and honest in business dealings, as judged by the code regulating the money-making world. He provides handsomely for his household; is more than liberal to his wife in gratifying all material wants and ever ready to respond to calls for money for church and philanthropy.

"On the other hand he is, as you have said, a boor when the mood seizes him to be ill-tempered and insulting in manner and language; he goes out of his way to displease without provocation, regardless of the presence of servants and others. In one word, it is a case of gross incompatibility, aggravated by the extreme sensitiveness of one party and the bad temper of the other. She appealed to me for advice when she felt that she could no longer bear it and live. What could I, as her pastor and friend, counsel her to do! You read enough of her letter—by the way, she must have been utterly distraught to have addressed it to you—to let me know that she has what she considers a reprieve. I am most thankful for the extension of time for thought and prayerful deliberation. For, as I have told her from the first, this is an affliction for which grace and help must be sought as truly as if her heart's desire had been taken from her by death. Not until she comes to the full appreciation of this can she hope for light to guide her through the darkness that enshrouds her soul."

ANITA was silent for a long minute, her expressive face betraying perplexity as well as sorrow.

"May I know"—she said musingly at last—"what your advice to her has been?" He looked up from the letter he was rereading.

"What you would have gathered from what is written here if you had not refrained—like the soul of honor you are—from reading the letter to the end. But one bit of counsel, in the fear of the Lord and in justice to her. I told her that were she my sister instead of my parishioner and the dear friend of my wife, I could say nothing less or more. It is her duty as a Christian woman to keep her marriage vow to live with this lawful—and faithful—husband until death parts them. I could say nothing else, my darling!"—for she had started as if to remonstrate. "She must bear the cross the Father of mercies lays upon her until He sees fit to lift it or to make the load lighter in some way known to Him alone. I urged her, also, to try as never before to bear this trial patiently, and with renewed courage. The man has some excellent traits and is, I am sure, sincerely attached to her. I begged her to endure by every means in her power as woman, wife and a disciple of Him Who when He was reviled, reviled not again, and bore to the bitter end such contumely, injustice and perfidy as none of us is ever called upon to suffer. In the first warmth of ineffable sympathy you are not yet ready to agree with me. By and by you will second my counsel. I am longing to talk with you by reason of the love we bear the poor stricken creature."

He took up the letter which he had returned to the envelope and studied the superscription. Next he

"As I said, Freeman is a helpless cripple. Can't walk a step. He is a good Christian man, and it is a terrible cross to him that he can't attend church" reached to the back of the desk for a magnifying-glass and held it above the paper.

"Herein is mystery!" he said slowly. "The 's' is in a different hand from the rest of the address and in different ink. You must take this to Mrs. King tomorrow and explain how you were led to open it. It will pave the way to the revelation she desires as much as you must, by now. It is just possible that one of her maids may have tampered with the address as a foolish trick or for other reasons of her own. In any event, it is wise to let her mistress know of it."

Verily, Miss Briggs had reckoned shrewdly but without her host.

CHAPTER XVI

MRS. WINGATE "ran across" the Atlantic every year with the regularity of a salaried "buyer." She had now been absent from her native shores four months. Her itinerary for the season embracing a trip to Egypt and Constantinople, she landed in New York on Monday, bringing with her three English guests in whose company she had traveled on the other side and on the voyage homeward.

The well-appointed mansion was in perfect order for her reception and she entertained the Hailes, introducing the husband as "our rector" at a quiet dinner on Friday night. The wife was entirely presentable and she was unaffectedly "attached" to her. Mrs. Wingate made her first appearance in public on the Sunday succeeding her return.

As she raised her head after the moment of silent prayer that began the morning's devotions, she saw that the pew in front of her was occupied by strangers. At the end furthest from the door was an elderly lady in black, who, when Mrs. Wingate first looked at her, was adjusting an acousticon to her ear. Next to her was a pretty girl tastefully attired, and beyond her at the head of the pew were two young fellows apparently about eighteen and twenty, well set up, bright-faced, with the general aspect of alertness and intelligence that belong to the American college boy. This she instantly assumed them to be, and gave her attention to the calendar containing the order of the day's services.

She had been notified by a paper received overnight that the opening anthem would be a favorite selection with her. Indeed, she had brought it herself to the notice of the choir master a year ago, and presented copies to the choir with her compliments. It was a graceful tribute and her heart beat high with pleasure as the first strains thrilled the air. An instant later, her attention was disagreeably diverted by seeing the taller of the two youths before her nudge the other in the ribs and pass to him the calendar open at the second page, containing notices of the week's services, his fingers upon a line about half-way down the page. The other nodded, smiling broadly and handed the paper to the girl, who judging by the resemblance in feature and expression, was evidently his sister. She inclined her head approvingly and laid the calendar on the lap of the elderly lady, who adjusted her eye-glasses to read the passage indicated. A smile that comprehended all three of the juniors finished the performance and the folded paper went back upon its circuit. By this time the anthem was well on its way, and none of the irreverent group had lent a show even of attention to the glorious strains.

TO SAY that Mrs. Wingate was mortified would express but feebly emotions that, as she told her guests at luncheon, "quite marred her enjoyment of the entire service."

"I beg you not to imagine that such behavior is habitual to our congregations," she assured the Englishman at luncheon, who "had not seen anything to complain of in the little by-play."

"Youngsters will be youngsters the world over."

"They were nice-looking lads," observed his wife, soothingly. "And the girl was decidedly pretty."

"The pew belongs to friends of mine who have owned it for years," responded the hostess. "I suppose they are out of town and the sexton inadvertently put these strangers into it. I shall warn him to be more careful in future."

Tone and speech were so in keeping with the position of "Lady of the Manor" that her visitors saw nothing unusual in the remark. The occurrence was not mentioned again. The hostess declared in the afternoon that she "could not think of keeping them within prisoners' docks in such divine weather," and sent the trio—man, wife and sister-in-law—for a long drive in the suburbs beyond Yonkers.

For herself, she "made a point of" attending the service "as an example, you know, to those who care little for church observances."

She almost repented her loyalty when she beheld, upon gaining her pew, the objectionable quartet in full possession of the quarters occupied by them in the forenoon. They were unquestionably strangers in the city who had liked the exercises of the morning well enough to repeat the experience. Measurably consoled by the logical reflection, she managed to detach her thoughts from the nuisance while the services were in progress. The sight of the note-book in which the girl had made penciled entries during the sermon of the forenoon, rekindled her wrath. She had tried to excuse the misdemeanor to herself and her guests by the assumption that the intruders were attracted to the Banner Church by the reputation of the eloquent

The World's Eyes on Washington

AS THE date set for the meeting of the Washington International Conference on Disarmament approaches, it is becoming evident that the fire kindled by the call is spreading to all the nations. We find it blazing with growing brightness in Geneva, where the League, driven by the power of public opinion, has at last taken up for consideration the problem which is so vital to the welfare of the world—the reduction of huge armaments, the very existence of which is an invitation to war and which, even in times of peace, make life a hopeless slavery to all but the few who profit by the affliction.

Viscount Bryce, one of the most broadminded statesmen of our day, reflected this opinion in his farewell message to the American people before sailing for England at the close of his recent visit. At a notable gathering in New York, he told his hearers of the dangers that even now threaten Europe, and of the universal desire for peace. "There never was a moment in history," he declared with great earnestness, "when so much depended upon the preservation of peace and on bringing the nations into accord and co-operation." He believes they are all sincere at heart and that their representatives will meet the Washington conferees in that spirit. "Armaments," he warned us, "instead of making for peace, make for war. They keep the idea of war constantly in the public mind."

Meanwhile, all eyes are focused on Washington. According to present plans, nine nations will be represented at the Conference table to consider purely Far Eastern problems, namely: Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, China, Belgium, Holland, Portugal and the United States. A wider representation, which would include many of the smaller powers, has not been invited, as it would lead to prolonged discussion and needless delays.

With the great event so near at hand, it is worth while to review the situation with which the Conference will have to deal. Authoritative figures from Washington place the active armies of the leading nations of the world today at 5,000,000 men. They stand in this order:

|------------------|-----------|------------------|---------|
| France.....      | 1,034,000 | Greece.....      | 255,000 |
| Great Britain... | 740,000   | Spain.....       | 253,000 |
| Russia.....      | 538,000   | United States... | 249,000 |
| Poland.....      | 450,000   | Switzerland....  | 170,000 |
| Italy.....       | 350,000   | Turkey.....      | 152,000 |
| Japan.....       | 300,000   | Czechoslovakia.. | 150,000 |
| Germany.....     | 100,000   |                  |         |

In the background of this seemingly moderate estimate of fighting forces towers the gigantic shadow of the reserves. In most of these lands, practically the entire male adult population is subject to the call to service. It is estimated that the whole, regular and reserves, would aggregate between 15,000,000 and 20,000,000. Italy alone in reserves has 4,627,000, and Japan 1,845,000. The United States has no organized reserves, but it has its National Guard.

These figures, however, huge as they are, represent only the surface aspect of the task which now falls to the coming Conference. There are many other features that must be dealt with before the evil of militarism can be fully unmasked.

Meanwhile, public opinion in every land is working overtime in aid of peace. Italy has set an example to her allies in greatly reducing her army, and France and England are beginning to realize that the fundamental question they must now face is one that goes to the very heart of the welfare of both nations. The new spirit of our time is drawing all lands together, so that they may stand on a common platform—that demanding such a sweeping reduction of armaments as will cease to make any power a menace to world peace.

Following the lead of the American churches—which have splendidly responded to the appeal in the Christian Herald—urging the President to use every effort in making the work of the Conference successful, the churches of the United Kingdom are now speaking boldly in favor of the adoption of a uniform Disarmament policy by all the governments, which will no longer impose upon the people burdens that have become intolerable. At a recent national conference, the Christian women of the United Kingdom adopted a ringing resolution calling for Disarmament, and declaring that the cost of great armies and navies and their accompaniments, has become a burden so heavy that it is wrecking the world and can no longer be borne.

$5,000 More for China

THE Christian Herald has just cabled $5,000 gold to Rev. Z. C. Beals, Treasurer of the Christian Herald China Famine Relief Committee in Wuhu, in response to the following appeal:

"We here in China are certainly having our share of famine. No sooner is one famine over than another has started. The Northern one was over in June and we praised God and took courage. Then we heard of the Kweichow famine of West China, where probably 2,000,000 people were starving. Now, the Yangtze, Han and Hwai rivers have overflowed their banks and the inland is seven or eight feet under water. Villages, towns and hamlets are washed away and thousands drowned. In one place there is a great lake 16 miles wide and 150 miles long where formerly there were flourishing villages and farms."

"Now, dear friends, I know the Christian Herald was in the big drive, but that is over, and if the office would send us a few thousands for this local relief it would be a God-send. I can only say 'pray over this,' and if you all think it wise, send it to your Christian Herald Committee and we will see that it is wisely expended."

"The Yangtze has broken its banks at Chang, Shasi and near Wuhu where we live. How we missionaries look to the Christian Herald for help!"

Dr. Beals' summary of a very serious situation has been confirmed from several other sources, and we feel that the Family Circle will heartily approve of our efforts to relieve it in some measure. This flood famine emphasizes again the great importance of famine prevention work such as the Christian Herald and the American Committee for China Famine Fund have in preparation.

Science and the Weather

OUR weather experts in Washington have been looking over the numerous atmospheric and other eccentricities of this planet during the past summer, with a view of finding whether the season was in any scientific sense a remarkable one. In the course of their investigation they have found enough to justify the conclusion that our earth has established a new record for unexpected happenings, including hail-storms, excessive drought, waterspouts, tornadoes, floods, earthquakes, big and little, cyclones, typhoons, simultaneous volcanic eruptions, and new craters developed. At one time, it would seem from the record, that a majority of the big volcanoes, some of which had been inactive for years, had suddenly burst into concerted activity. This was especially the case in Italy, Hawaii, Mexico, Nicaragua, Salvador and several other countries. As if to complement these subterranean disturbances, severe drought and heat have visited other parts of the globe. The great Swiss glaciers have shrunk perceptibly and at the same time some of the lakes have diminished greatly in volume. Taken altogether, the weather has set a new record which has had no parallel in the last fifty years.

This series of disasters, bringing untold suffering to multitudes, leads the weather sharps to conclude that the disturbances, having been world-wide, they are to be attributed to abnormal heat and lack of moisture, and after a very thorough diagnosis of the whole matter, they have reached the conclusion that the indications point to an open winter. Science has its own way of judging of the conditions that invite such phenomena, and if their forecast of a comparatively mild winter ahead should be justified, the great majority will hail it as the one consolation which, like Hope in the bottom of Pandora's box, enables us to bear the rest with some degree of equanimity.

A Modern Church's Requirements

SOMETHING of the diversity of activities in the modern church can be imagined after glancing over a bulletin, the first number of which has just been issued by the Commission on Life Service of the Methodist Episcopal Church. It is intended to convey information on the personnel needs of the denomination in its home and foreign mission fields, hospitals, educational institutions, etc.

Look at this list of occupations providing opportunities for Christian life service, for which applicants are wanted:

Architects, bacteriologists, hostel business manager, dentists, dietitians, women evangelists, ministers, general missionaries, trained nurses, supervisors of nurses, visiting nurses, parish workers, pastors' assistants, pathologists, pharmacists, physicians, recreational directors, religious education directors, church secretaries, social workers, student workers, boarding school, hostel, hospital and orphanage superintendents, technicians and physical directors and teachers for such work as the Bible, college, commercial, domestic science, English, high school, industrial, kindergarten, music, science, Spanish and normal school.

The bulletin says the Church has immediate need of 1200 trained men to preach the Gospel and in discussing the opportunities of the ministry, it sums them up in these words:

It is broad: It means a superb chance to let a community see how a Christian man should live—the challenge of a fine, clean, strong manhood; it means preaching the most vital truth known in terms that contemporary men, women and children can understand; it means finding the social pulse of church and community and making intelligent, effectual effort to bring both to gauge their moral and social health by the moral and social health of Jesus; it means the realization in practice that "all things are yours" and are to be used as educational materials for the instruction of all people in righteousness and downright justice—an instructional process that is carried on the year round in the pulpit and in the direction of all religious educational activities of church and community; it means participation in all genuine efforts for civic betterment, social reform, national integrity and world peace and regeneration. What more could be asked in the interest of breadth of ministry?

Can you think of a more comprehensive or compelling call for a life service than this?

Are They Fools?

"I SEE by my morning 'coffee news,'" says Old Man Ultimate Consumer, "that in the coming Disarmament Conference, we shall have to be on our look-out with the Japanese delegation, as Japan has sinister designs on our possessions in the Pacific." (Reads extract from the editorial as follows: "Japan will bear watching. She cannot be trusted. There is no question that she is planning to gain every possible advantage over China, and in a long and astute policy carried on for years she designs to get control of the Pacific. The visionary policy of the impractical pacifists is fraught with serious danger to this country. We cannot advocate any real extent of disarmament. It is dangerous to think of it. We must continue to build up a strong navy specially to protect our rights in the Pacific. The pacifists are fools to talk disarmament at a time when the nations are all making plans to increase their navies. Again we say, the pacifist is a fool.") "But why is a pacifist a fool?" asks Old Man Ultimate Consumer. "What does a pacifist want? He wants war to stop. I don't see why that makes a man a fool."

"But 'he is a fool if he demands such an impractical act as complete disarmament,'" says the Old-Timer quoting his editor. "The world is not ready for such a step, and it would not be safe."

"But why is a pacifist a fool simply because he wants war to cease?" says the Minister. "And when will war cease if at some time in history the nation do not stop making weapons of warfare? If I go around all the time carrying deadly weapons on my person and all my neighbors do the same because we keep on fearing and hating one another, when will the possibility of peace ever be realized? I don't see why the pacifist is a fool because he wants the sort of thing to end."

"But it is a dangerous thing to advocate such a cessation of war preparation just now," says The Old-Timer. "The time has not come to disarm. And the United States cannot disarm alone."

"Why not?" says the Minister boldly. "Suppose at the coming Conference the United States should say to the other representatives—'We are ready to disarm completely except the necessary police protection that every sensible citizen recognizes as necessary. Will you do the same? We mean real disarmament, the cessation of military preparation. The world is sick of war. Let us stop hating and fearing one another and all stop together.' Suppose our country should take that attitude? What is there impractical about that?"

"Any man is a fool who advocates complete disarmament," says the Old-Timer. "The time is not ripe for peace. We must watch Japan particularly. We are in danger on the Pacific."

"If I am a fool simply because I want war to stop and the making of war material to cease," says the Minister, "then I wonder what all the rest are. When will war cease unless at some time we stop hating and fearing?"

"The pacifist is a fool," the Old-Timer began to say "because he—"

"That ends the argument," says Old Man Ultimate. "Excuse me, but I have to borrow some money to pay my taxes. Good-day." And the conference broke up sine die.

The World News of the Week

Three More Nations Are Invited to Washington Parley

THE list of nations which are to take part in the Washington conference has been extended to include Belgium, Holland and Portugal and with the consent of the other participants Secretary Hughes has sent formal invitations to those governments on behalf of President Harding. These smaller countries, however, will be limited in their participation to matters affecting the Pacific and the Far East, where they have colonial possessions, since it is the desire of the American Government that the question of limitation of armaments should be decided by the five great allied and associated powers.

The representation at the Conference also will be widened through the giving of places on Great Britain's delegation to three of her dominions, the total number of delegates for the Empire to be six. Australia already has named as her delegate George Foster Pearce, Minister of Defense. Premier Lloyd George has stated that it will be impossible for him to attend the Conference and expects to send Arthur J. Balfour as the head of the British representatives, although this choice has not been announced officially.

Paris despatches told of the intention of the French Government to oppose any move which would involve the reduction of the French army below 400,000 or 450,000 men, with a like number subject to immediate mobilization, so long as the American-British-French defensive agreement drafted at the Paris conference remains unratified. French officials assert that the German military forces are organized so as to permit the mobilization of an army of 1,000,000 within a week, and the French delegates will argue that national security demands the retention of a strong army.

Suggestion that Congress should recess while the Conference is in progress were vetoed by President Harding because of the delay in the passage of important legislation, and it was announced there would be no recess other than a "breathing spell" from Thanksgiving until the opening of the regular session on December 5.

Debt Refunding Again Urged

ADMINISTRATION pressure for early Congressional action authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to conduct negotiations for the refunding of the debts of foreign nations to the United States has been renewed with the appearance of Secretary Mellon before the House Ways and Means Committee. He declared it was imperative to refund these obligations at the earliest possible moment because the present uncertainty is handicapping commerce and holding up the Treasury's financial arrangements; and urged that he be given a free hand, subject to the President's approval, to arrange terms, a grant of powers so extensive that many members of Congress are loath to concede it.

The Secretary expressed the belief that the governments of Europe, which owe nine-tenths of the nearly $10,000,000 due the United States, would be able to resume the payments of interest in another year. Since 1919 no interest has been collected. He again stated that there had been no overtures for a foreign government for the cancellation of its debt.

Suggestions have come from abroad that the question of the cancellation of the Allied debts should be considered at the Washington Conference, but it was made known that President Harding was opposed to such a course, since the present agenda for the Conference provides enough opportunities for disagreement.

Liberty bonds recently have made notable advances in price and the increase in market value over the low mark for the year have been placed at $1,250,000,000.

Second League Assembly Ends

THE League of Nations Assembly has ended its second session at Geneva, with opinions as to its accomplishments widely at variance. If it failed to do all that its ardent supporters had hoped for, it at least made greater progress than the pessimists among ing the covenant, and among the amendments on which action was deferred was the one providing that all sovereign states should automatically become members of the League which had been demanded by Argentina. It will be easier in future though to adopt amendments because of the dropping of the provision requiring unanimity in favor of a three-fourths majority vote.

the delegates had expected. President Van Karnebeck, in a summing up of its work, stressed the importance of the International Court of Justice and of the technical organizations set up by the Assembly as marking real progress toward the kind of internationalism which the League was organized to bring about; and declared that while those who had expected the League to work miracles which would transform the world into a paradise would be disappointed the results of the measures taken by the session would confound those who had predicted the dissolution of the League. Despite this utterance there were apprehensions among some delegations that the Washington Conference might see the formation of an international organization which will be separate from and a rival of the League as at present organized.

Among the final acts of the session was the reelection of Brazil, Belgium, China and Spain as the four non-permanent members of the League Council. One important amendment to the League Covenant, adopted unanimously, authorizes the Council to postpone in the case of any particular member the coming into effect of the economic blockade against a covenant-breaking state—a change designed to lessen the peril to small countries by leaving a way out of the obligation to blockade a nation making war illegally. In the main the Assembly was chary of chang-house for local committees and stimulate their efforts. Already many cities have taken up the work. Committees of the National Conference on Unemployment, called by President Harding, were completing their reports on measures to improve conditions for submission to the conference when it reassembles.

In Great Britain also the unemployment situation has been causing serious concern and since Premier Lloyd George's return from Scotland the Cabinet has been hard at work trying to find means of improving conditions.

AT WORK ON THE RACE PROBLEM. The Commission on Race Relations, recently created by the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, has held its first session in Washington in an effort to find means by which the churches may make their influence more effective in promoting a Christian spirit in race relations. The commission, which is headed by John J. Egan, of Atlanta, includes Christian leaders of both races.

THIRTY-THREE DIE IN PARIS WRECK. Thirty-three persons perished and scores were injured when a rear-end collision of suburban trains in a half-mile tunnel leading to the St. Lazare railway station in Paris was followed by the explosion of a gas reservoir and the burning of seventeen coaches.

VALUE OF MANUFACTURES HUGE. Census Bureau figures placed at $62,910,202,000 the value of the products of the nation's manufacturing industries in 1920—a total three times as great as in 1910 and five and one-half times as great as in 1900. The capitalization of the 289,768 manufacturing establishments was $44,678,911,000, with 9,103,200 wage earners employed.

ONE MILLION VOLTS IN LIGHTNING FLASH. The voltage of a lightning flash is between 20,000,000 and 100,000,000 volts, averaging probably 50,000,000, according to Dr. Charles P. Steinmetz, famous electrical expert, in announcing that lightning had been reproduced experimentally in laboratories. Five hundred volts is sufficient to kill a man, and the feat of transmitting 1,000,000 volts was recently hailed as an epoch-making event.

The Re-Birth of Hope

A Sermon by REV. ORVIS F. JORDAN *

TEXT—Heb. 11:1. "Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen."

GLOOM has fallen upon the world and particularly upon the soul of America. How different is the state of the national mind from the easy-going days of ten years ago! Secure in our national prosperity, it seemed that no evil could overtake us. In place of the braggadocio of that period, one hears now more frequently the forebodings of evil. Hope has been killed in the nation which was once the home of the optimistic spirit.

One sees this clearly enough in the current fiction. The most talked-of book the past year was Sinclair Lewis's "Main Street." The book tells all about the sins of the small town, but has no eyes for its virtues. Its ugliness, provincialism, gossip and social cliques are portrayed with photographic accuracy. But what about the young men in every small town who are starting on the road to a great career? Where is the woman saint who from her invalid chair dispenses good-will and kindness throughout the community? The very popularity of "Main Street" was due to the fact that it fitted the national mood for the moment. We are decidedly in the dumps.

America has been worshipping idols, and one by one these false images have been broken by the war conditions. We used to believe that the biggest thing in the world was money. Because we believed this, we have finally gotten more than half of the money of the western world. Europe is sending us shiploads of gold; we are about to be smothered under the load of gold. And we are finding out that there are so many things that money will not buy. It has not brought us brotherhood, but on the contrary, bitter disputes between capital and labor. It has not brought us morality, but rather threatens to undermine the character of our young people. Why should they work so hard as their fathers, when there is so much money? Many an unhappy home has learned that it takes more than money to bring happiness. It takes love and trust and some other things that money can not buy.

THEN we had made an idol of machinery. Machinery is not a bad thing any more than money is, in itself. But we had trusted in our Yankee inventiveness to build us machines to carry our burdens. Materialistic science cultivated in the laboratories raised its proud head against the idealism of the race. Now we know that it takes more than machines to redeem humanity. The same scientist who makes an anti-toxin against diphtheria can also produce a poison so deadly that a single drop on the skin will kill. We have machines to knit our underwear and to thresh our grain, but we have other machines which can hurl bombs or carry on raids against women and children from the sky. Machinery is a good thing only in the hands of good men. There is something greater in the world than cogs and pulleys, than steam and electricity. That greater thing is moral personality. We are beginning to see it dimly. And with the upsetting of another idol, we are sad.

For a little while we worshipped at the shrine of the "good old war god." There are people in America today who miss entirely the lesson of the terrible plight of Germany. Years ago, Germany refused a treaty of arbitration with the United States. She chose to put her faith in armies and submarines rather than in good-will. Her energy went into the creation of big Berthas and deadly gas bombs rather than into the creation of universal brotherhood. She writhes under the heel of the conqueror today, and knows what occasioned her downfall. It would be hard to get up a new war in Germany until every living person of this generation is dead. They prayed to Mars and he failed them.

America has had her little turn at aping the ways of the militaristic nations, but the great body of American opinion has quickly fallen away from militarism. When President Harding issued the call for a disarmament Congress, he was quickly supported by favorable sentiment all over the nation.

Our god cannot be either Money or Machines, nor yet Military Power. These have all been tried and found to be no gods at all. As tools in the hands of spiritually minded men, money and machines have their place. Beyond this they are impotent.

Meanwhile when shall some one discover that what we are all hungry for is the life-giving word of Jesus Christ? A generation has come on that really knows very little about Him. The examination tests of Columbia University showed that most of the students on entrance knew too little of the Bible to understand English literature. How can people with such ignorance of the Bible know very much about Jesus Christ? The remedy for our gloom is the hope-giving message of Jesus Christ. When men and women hear the Gospel, we shall enter into the era of the re-birth of hope.

JESUS came to teach the world that the source of human happiness is spiritual. Those that mourn shall find at His hands a comfort that takes them beyond the power of sorrow. By His word the proud spirit is made humble, and in its new humility finds God and the Kingdom of love. Even material things often wait upon spiritual processes. "Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness and all things else shall be added unto you."

Have we not all our lives been missing just this truth? The little boy promises that if he gets a little red wagon, he will never want anything again. He is sincere in this sentiment. But he does want one thing after another, each toy being for the moment the greatest thing in all the world. And the big grown boys and girls are just as bad. They want automobiles and Persian rugs and fine houses and club memberships and all the rest. In none of these things do they find abiding satisfaction. Jesus Christ must young children. They do not understand. She has filled her heart with a wonderful new love. What are night vigils beside this great gift? How can bitter toil contaminate the sweetness of mother-love?

Most of us live with proud wills out of harmony with the great universe of which we are a part. Were all factory operatives independent of an organizing mind there could be no automobiles. When the factory workers in Russia threw out the chemist because he wore a white collar, and tried to run without him, they soon had the machinery spoiled. God is the organizing mind of the world in which we live. Jesus was at one with His Father. The secret of harmony with the divine spirit He seeks to impart to His followers. When our wills are all subject to the infinite will, we will no longer have the sorrows that fill the earth at the present hour.

We not only want happiness for the individual, but we want good-will and brotherhood for society. Who of us would want to find happiness which could not be shared by our loved ones? It would be hard for most of us to start on a journey to the Celestial City, as Christian did in Pilgrim's Progress, leaving his loved ones behind.

Nor does the Gospel of Jesus Christ contemplate that we should live our religious life alone. He always talked His religion in social terms. He gathers a group of believers into a school and these fellow-students developed a wonderful fellowship with each other and with their Lord. These believers at once after Pentecost sought to bring into being a church. It was inconceivable that their joyous faith should live in a corner by itself. The Lord had foreshadowed an entirely new social order. Everything waited upon the coming of the Kingdom of God. When the will of God became the law of human conduct, when the Golden Rule was the mainspring of human conduct, all would have opportunity to share the happiness of the few.

The small boy enjoys his candy more with a playmate. We all feel that we want a friend to talk over the good book we have just read, or to tell the news of some good fortune that has just come to us. It is of the genius of the Christian religion that we should want to share it with some one, and that we should dream of the time when it should possess the whole earth.

AT THE present time there are men and women who find it hard to share our spiritual satisfactions. The man who must work twelve hours a day and seven days a week has but little opportunity for soul culture. There are more of such men in the world than some of us know about. The woman who must forego many of the sweet privileges of motherhood, by leaving the home to seek a livelihood knows the bitterness of thwarted opportunities. How can a man keep the Lord's Day when the bread of his children depends upon his toil for seven days? Do not the very conditions of modern business life make success difficult for some men without sacrifice of principle?

The social situation is full of hatreds and prejudices that make impossible the full sharing of the Christ spirit. Race hatred has risen to unprecedented heights. The industrial order also is full of suspicion and ill-will. It is no more a one-sided situation than is any other human dispute. One side has abused its power, and the other side has too often cheated and reduced output. Feudal threats are matched by conspiracy and graft.

The Kingdom of Christ, when it comes fully, will wipe out the racial hatreds, for God made of one flesh all the nations of the earth.

Our faith and our hope are joined together in a great spiritual process at this time. It is time to lift the level of human life. Thomas A. Edison is quoted as saying that the next great achievement will be discovery in the realm of the human spirit. If he said that, it shows that he continues to grow, for it is one of the wisest things ever imputed to him. There is nothing we need to know so much as how to live.

All over the world we hear of children committing suicide. There is a great increase of such unnatural crimes in the United States. This abhorrent by-product of the war is the latest expression of the despair into which the world has fallen, as it contemplates its sin and misery. The religion of Christ takes the fair young girl with the poison vial in her hands, and leads her to the window. Outside is the sunshine and the garden of Christian virtues. Beyond are mountains to climb, and far distant shines the New Jerusalem in its heavenly glory. The spirit of Christ leads this child out of materialism's hovel to a place where zephyrs play and where the birds sing. This is the wonderful meaning of the rebirth of world's hope as it sits at the feet of Jesus Christ.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Blest Be the Tie that Binds" or "In the Cross of Christ I Glory."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Psalm 148. "A Song of Praise to God for His Goodness."

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation: (See page 771, first column.)

Sermon—"THE RE-BIRTH OF HOPE"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Lead, Kindly Light," or "Blessed Assurance, Jesus Is Mine."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon to be read aloud.

Redeemer of the world, we pour out our heart's thanksgiving for Thy mercies, and lift them up in reverence for Thy goodness, and consecrate them more to Thy service, as we go our ways to walk in Thine. AMEN.

first teach them that the source of happiness is spiritual. As one modern writer puts it: "The city of Happiness is located in the state of mind."

Those who have thought that Jesus Christ came to bring only a cross have quite misapprehended His spirit and word. He came to transform crosses from ugly trees into symbols of beauty. When His own cross already cast its shadow across His life He said, "My joy I leave with you." The beatitudes are only rules for being happy in spite of adverse circumstances. Though one is persecuted he may find compensations. Though one be spiritually hungry and thirsty, this is the door into new and wonderful experiences.

Jesus Christ was, first of all, a wonderful example of the joyous and triumphant life. He had not where to lay His head, but He had the inner grace of thanksgiving. When tax-day came, He sent Peter a-fishing, but Divine Providence did not fail Him. He had some cruel enemies, but out of unlettered fishermen He developed some wonderful friends. His life was so joyous because He had rid Himself once for all of the two great enemies of fear and hate. He knew no fear, for was not the Heavenly Father ever with Him? When we look around us and see all the people that are nursing pet fears—fears of illness, fears of poverty, fears of enemies—we can then understand how wonderful it is to have a living faith in a God who really works for us. Nor did Jesus ever hate. He might rebuke sharply, as He did on occasion. But in the supreme temptation of the cross, surrounded by cruel, jeering enemies, He was able to say, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

How few of us have learned that it is not our hates that make up life's joy, but our loves. Many may pity the young mother with her nursery full of

Shrinking from Exposure

SUNDAY. Gen. 3:10. "I went and hid myself." Why did he hide himself? Because he could not face the exposure of his sin. He had rebelled against the Lord, and done that which was evil in His sight. And the evil thing worked to this dark issue—it perverted his nature and inclined him against the Lord whom he had resisted. He had no delight in God. He feared Him, and he had a growing distaste of Him. He had no desire to meet Him; nay, indeed, he fled from Him. He sought to seclude himself, and find peace in forgetfulness. At any rate and at any price he must not meet God. "I went and hid myself."

We have all shared this man's quest of a hiding-place from God. We may have sought along another road, but we have shared his flight from God. We have entered into his sin and the poisonous thing has worked in us as it worked in him; our palate has been perverted, sweet things have become bitter, and we have lost our delight in God. We have no lover's desire to walk and talk with Him.

How was it at the close of the day, at the hour of our devotions, the time of the evening sacrifice? Did we hasten into the secret place like children going home from school, jubilant and glad? Were we almost breathless in our eager speech with the Lord? Nay, nay, it was quite other than this. That night we missed our devotions. The prayers were left unsaid. Or if we prayed, we prayed without looking. We hid ourselves in blind words, empty words: we gabbled a medley of words in which there was no communion. We did not want any communion. We had no desire to gaze on Him whom we had pierced. And so we ran away from open and vital fellowship. We prayed prayerless prayers—prayers which had no windows, no outlook, no aspirations. Or more probably still, we never even appeared to pray at all. We just left them out of the day. That night the altar-fire was not burning. There was no going into the holy place. We just scuttled in to bed and sank into an unbeliever's sleep. And what was all this but a childish attempt to hide ourself from the Lord, lest we should suffer a divine exposure of our shame.

For that is the real secret of the matter. Our sins troop out when we come into the presence of the Lord. The light disturbs them. The psalmist was relating just such an experience in the words—"Thou hast set our secret sins in the light of Thy countenance." They are no longer secrets when we pass into the light. The hidden things are all revealed.

Truly, God's light is revealing. But it is more than revealing—our God is a consuming fire. That is the severity of God's holiness: it is also His infinite mercy. The fire of God is not merely destructive, like an incendiary fire, consuming no end of precious things. It is a refiner's fire. It is the servant of purity: it is the minister of chastening and beauty. It burns to cleanse and to convert unloveliness into loveliness. So when we hide away from the light of life, we are hiding from the ally of our redemption. The light is not merely the light of judgment; it is the light of grace, and therefore of restoration.

And, therefore, when we have sinned, let us not hide ourselves from the light. Let us hasten into the Presence of the Lord and expose our souls to their innermost depths. If we are already poisoned, let us have the poisoned faculty cauterized by the burning, purifying flame of the Holy Ghost. Let us not run away to hide. Let us hide in Him.

The Greatest of Christian Graces

MONDAY. I Cor. 12:31. "But covet earnestly the best gifts; yet I show unto you a more excellent way." Gifts are what a man has; love, what he is. Gifts may pass away, while love never faileth. Gifts are mental or executive, but love is moral and spiritual. Gifts are the scaffolding, love the temple. Solomon had gifts, the Apostle John had love. Gifts are the attributes of the Almighty, love is the essence of His being.

The gifts of tongues, mysteries, knowledge, benevolence and martyrdom are only human attainments on the outside, painted flowers, while love in the inner soil of the heart grows fadeless blossoms. All gifts devoid of love are only valued at zero. The soul is an empty shell without love, however much the outside is adorned. He who seeks his own rather than the good of others, should find out that love seeketh not her own. What is not of love is sin.

Love casteth out fear, hatred, anger, jealousy—all the brood of evils. Love carries burdens for others, bearing sorrows and forgiving sins. It is kind to enemies, to the poor and helpless. If you have no one who loves you, you are alone. Love envieth not; it is best satisfied when it can die for another and rise again in glorious beauty.

Love, the queen of all thrones, the king of all kingdoms, will sway the sceptre of peace and victory forever! Love is a living prophecy of immortality; this world is not its home. Here we know love only in part; but there, face to face, we shall know as we are known.

The Golden Age

TUESDAY. Gal. 4:10. "Ye observe days and months and times and years." Some of us look back, some look forward, some look around. All times are God's times. Every day, month, year, is a day of challenge, a month of opportunity, a year of grace. Said a young man to Wendell Phillips: "If I had lived in your time I should have been heroic too." The great man replied, "You are living in my time and in God's time, and be sure of this, young man, no man could have been heroic then who cannot be heroic now."

There are no common times, places, people or events. Either life is all secular, or it is all religious. Either it is only freighted with the divine elements in spots or it is shot through and through with the Infinite. He who has the eye trained, the mind open, the heart receptive and the soul responsive will acknowledge at once that every day is holy, every task sublime, every river a Jordan, every Mount transfigured, every bush burning, every soul patterned after the God-plan, and every day, month, time and year a unit in the scope of Eternity.

In the year 1837, an employee in the United States Patent Office resigned his position, stating in his letter of resignation: "All the great inventions have now been made and henceforth the work of the Patent Office will deal mainly with small improvements on existing inventions and with other routine work." What a marvel that "other routine work" has been since that day. Better the philosophy of Robert Browning who sang, "Grow old along with me, the best is yet to be," with the consciousness that the miracle of unfolding civilization and developing progress is a daily occurrence, and that no day is greater or lesser in the groping for perfection and the search for desired goals.

Seeking and Finding

WEDNESDAY. Matt. 7:8. "He that seeketh findeth." Most of our gifts are undeserved, but few of them are unsought. We must go after the things we want. The kingdom of God must be sought. Several of Jesus' parables have this as their chief lesson. The seeking of spiritual gifts is not put in opposition to the seeking of temporal things but rather is put in priority. The Master never said that the Gentiles seek after things that are not worth seeking, but He made plain that the danger of us all is that we may make secondary things primary. One of Henry Drummond's finest sermons had as its theme, "First things first." A modern English poet speaks of himself as "the great lover." He names the things he has loved in life. The ideal Christian is a great seeker as well as a great lover of things true and beautiful and good.

"He that seeketh findeth." This is "important if true—and it is true. It is not true that the spiritual seeker always finds the thing he is seeking; but it is true that if he does not find the thing he is seeking, he does find something which is worth far more. The man who discovered gold in California was not seeking it. The man who invented the telephone was seeking something else. Many of us have sought peace—and found strength. We have sought happiness—and found joy. We have sought knowledge—and found truth. Read the Psalms. They reveal the fact that all the psalmists were great seekers. "One thing have I desired, that will I seek after." The end of the quest of every sincere soul is that which the man of God had in mind long, long ago, the knowledge of God with all that it implies. "In Thy light we shall see light." Having God, being sure of him, nothing is lacking to enrich the soul and to ennoble life.

C. C. A.

The Cares of this World

THURSDAY. Mark 4:19. "The cares of this world, and the deceitfulness of riches, and the lusts of other things entering in, choke the work and it becometh unfruitful." So Christ explains the fate of the seeds that fall among the thorns. The cares of this world, riches, and other things, all of them good in their places, enter in to do inestimable harm, choking the seed which should spring up and be fruitful. Always it is a struggle against these things.

James Douglass is quoted as having said recently in an article in the London Daily Express, that "England has no time for God." Does not the expression and its implications strike terror to your heart? Have you time for God, or have the cares of this world absorbed all your time?

To change the figure: One time I moved into a house which boasted a new furnace and a new flue. The furnace was one of excellent make, and from all appearances the flue was well constructed. My coal was safely in the bin and I looked forward to a warm, comfortable house. When cold weather came, I built the fire in the new furnace. It started fairly well, but, try as I might, I could get but little heat into the house. The furnace would consume my coal, but that seemed to be about the extent of its usefulness. I sought the trouble in vain and finally called the man who had installed the furnace and put in the flue. In a very short time he discovered the difficulty. In the bottom of the flue there had been left a place for a soot can, and this can had never been put in. The result was that the flue, instead of drawing as it should, was sucking in plenty of air from the bottom, and so was choking down my fire.

Christians do exactly the thing that flue did. The cares of this world, and other things all right in themselves, enter in until that fire within us is smothered out.

The Birthplace of Leadership

FRIDAY. John 1:46. "Can there any good thing come out of Nazareth?" Nazareth was a little secluded, provincial village. It was not supposed that anyone would look for anything startling or promising from that direction. But history has proven, that, contrary to expectation, the little towns and small hamlets yield their quota to the sum of greatness and achievement. The little villages of New England, for instance—those inland clusters of houses, shaded elms and quiet surroundings—have given us a larger quota of men and women of letters and art than many other localities with greater advantages. Genius knows no geography. Brain-power grows in isolation. Skill is developed in the corner. The desert sands breed the prophet; the Mount develops the seer. Out of obscurity come the presidents. From the forests come the preachers. From the wilderness come the reformers.

Despise not the commonplace. Look not in contempt on the so-called mediocre. One of our poets sings of "The Glory of the Small Towns." From the hills and valleys came the youth of the land to join the army of the holy ideal to make the world safe for democracy.

God moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform, beginning with new-born babes, such as that One born in the carpenter shop, or an Abraham Lincoln born in an obscure log hut. Nothing ever "happens" anywhere; all is under the guiding hand and ruling Providence of Omnipotence. And in the light of what we have seen and heard, that is enough.

The Nation's Greatest Need

SATURDAY. Psal. 33:12. "Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord." The Nation's greatest need today is to recognize the sovereignty of God. It will put iron into men's blood and strength into their resolve to do right. Yet, today there are many who have no time for God; they ignore His throne; they never mention His name; unless it be in some time of awful disaster and when all earthly things fail they turn to Him in last resort. How much better to remember Him all the way, allowing His throne to be set up in our hearts; giving place to His plan and looking forward to the consummation that shall be glorious and the victory eternal.

As we study the Scriptures we find it is a stormy book; there are battles and movement of things and while in places we see green pastures and feel the sweetness, yet these things are given amid convulsion in the social order, upheavals of kingdoms, the presence of enemies and terror, the marching of armed forces, the pestilence that walked in darkness, hurricanes of disaster that swept the land, rivers that have overflowed their banks. But God is over the King. He hath founded His Kingdom upon the seas and established it upon the floods. Multitudes turn to the wrong way, but in the thick of the fight and amidst the clamor of the world there is the voice of a great multitude amidst the mighty thunderings, saying "Hallelujah, for the Lord God Omnipotent reigneth."

God calls us to realize that He is on the throne and His voice is not meant as a lullaby, but intended to be clarion in tone. There are calls for rest of heart, but there is also the demand to tread the thorny steep ways that lead to holiness and if need be, to march without fear into the "Valley of the Shadow." The Lord reigns! Every man should then be at his task with both hands and consecrated soul, for he is on God's side and shall never meet defeat.

Real Poetry-Makers

I MET a girl yesterday—a girl with wide, wistful eyes, and quite a lot of bright hair tucked up under a soft velvet hat, and a curiously breathless little laugh. She was a stranger to me—only one figure detaching itself from a crowd—but I, she told me excitedly, was in no way a stranger to her!

"Why, I've loved your poetry," she said softly, "for years and years! I've read ever so much of it—nearly all that you've written, I guess. I remember lots of the verses. Some of them have made me smile—and some of them have made me cry. And just a few weeks ago I read one, after an awfully hard day with my children, and—"

I interrupted. I was glad of a chance to interrupt, for the most honest appreciation is often the most embarrassing.

"Your children?" I questioned incredulously. "Why—you're only a child yourself. Surely, you're not old enough to be married—and have children?"

The girl's wide eyes grew wider, under the shadow of her soft velvet hat. It was almost a full moment before she answered my question.

"But of course you would misunderstand," she told me, at last. "I'm so interested in my work that I never think to explain. No—I'm not married. But I have nearly two hundred children! I do settlement work, you see, in a large factory town. And the children of that town—bless their little hearts—are my especial charge. I teach them, and I organize their clubs, and I do my best to take care of them and—most of all—I love them. I can't help thinking of them, and speaking of them, as if they were my children."

I looked down into her eager face—so vividly full of enthusiasm and affection.

"I wish," I said, "that you'd tell me something about this work you so love."

AND so she told me . . . She told me of the little Italians and Hungarians and Jews—of the one small Chinese girl and of the wee Spanish boy. She told me, in a slightly hushed voice, of the sentence prayers that she has taught them to make—quite spontaneously—in classroom. And of the shy questions they ask her about the secrets of this life—and of the life to come.

"I adore them," she said, "every one of them! And they know it. And they care for me—I think—almost as much as I care for them. But—" all at once she broke off, in utter confusion. "But I've been talking about myself! And it's you—you that I want to talk about! I want to talk about your poetry."

Again it was necessary to change the subject.

"Have you ever written any poetry yourself?" I questioned hurriedly. "Loving it as you do, I should think that you'd make up some little verses. It's ever so easy to write poetry, if you love it!"

The girl's slim, small hand reached out, swiftly. The fingers that touched mine were tremulous.

"Oh," she breathed, "oh, if I only could write poetry! But I couldn't. I couldn't make up a verse to save my life!"

Who Couldn't Write a Verse to Save Their Lives

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

There are ever so many people who feel that they couldn't construct a story or paint a picture or even do an exquisite bit of embroidery on fine linen. Oftentimes they are the folk who look up, with a certain humble friendliness, to the people who can do the things that they so admire. And yet I have known many of these same folk to make the realest poetry, the most beautiful pictures and the most marvelous stories in the world. They have made them out of their lives!

The girl, for instance, that I met yesterday. She was almost aghast at my suggestion that she try to write verse. She thought that the making of poetry was a marvelous thing—a great, splendid gift.

She thought that it was a marvelous, out-of-reach thing. And yet, every day, she is making poetry. She is putting it into the lives of the little children that she works with. She is giving it, hourly, by the light of her eyes, and the touch of her hand. It isn't the kind of poetry that is written neatly across a page of white paper—it's a finer sort. It's the kind of poetry that is written by love, across a white page of life.

There are other people, too, that are doing the same thing. There's the woman who leaves her housework every afternoon to read the Scripture to an old minister who is blind. There's the young girl—full of life and gaiety—who takes time away from her pleasures to go twice a week, on visiting days, to the hospital where the boys who suffered injury in the World War are lying. For there are many of those boys—heroes we called them a few years ago—who are practically forgotten now!

Yes, there are other people who are doing the same thing. There are people who cook dainty little things for invalids, and other people who do unexpected bits of mending for very busy people. There are people who find time to write thoughtful wee letters when they're most needed; there are other people who are never too rushed or too busy to give a word of hope or cheer or inspiration. There are all these people and many more—so many that it would be quite impossible to count them!

YES, there are many poets and artists and writers who don't dream that they are making verses and pictures and stories. Look around and you'll see them, on every side, almost. You'll see them—and you'll recognize them when you see them.

They're ever so easy to recognize—ever so easy! Because they're just the friendly, kind, loving people who take time to make other people happier and better and more contented. Their poems are the pleasant words and deeds that will grow into sweet memories. And their pictures are the little acts of fellowship and faith and trust that will, in time, become visions. And their stories are the impressions that they leave upon the hearts and souls of the folk who know them, and the folk who meet them, and even the folk who are casual passers-by!

JUST a smile when the road seems hard;
Just a laugh in the gloom;
Just a hope, when the soul seems scarred,
Like a light in a darkened room . . .
Just the touch of a tender hand,
And a song, and a bit of prayer;
Just the courage to understand!—
And the heart to truly care!

Just these things—and your life may be,
A perfect poem to the world;
Just these things, and the earth can see,
Your mind like a flag unfurled.
Just the touch of a tender hand,
And a message from God above—
Just the courage to understand,
And the heart to truly love!

Never a man will pass you by,
That does not take of your cheer,
Never a woman will meet your eye,
That does not hold you dear. . . .
Poets and artists, they do their best,
But yours is the better part—
For you give of a friendship Christ has blessed,
And the love of a helping heart!

What Europe Thinks of the Conference

For generations British foreign policy, so far as European affairs were concerned, was based upon the theory of a balance of power. For the security of Great Britain no power was to be allowed to become predominant on the continent—predominant, that is, in a military sense. Hence the policy of alliances, understandings, secret agreements, and arrangements with which diplomacy enlaced Europe in an almost inextricable mesh, always having for its object such groupings of the nations, small and great, as would insure a balance between supposedly rival combinations. This was the fundamental thing in British diplomacy, and so long as it succeeded Great Britain did not need to maintain a large army. It could rely upon the balance of power to protect it from danger near home, and upon its fleet for the protection of its colonies and dominions, the support of its commerce, and the furtherance of its plans for imperial expansion everywhere.

But the Great War has destroyed the balance of power. There is today only one military power of importance on the continent of Europe, and that is France. What is more, France is also the greatest military power in the world. Its huge army is in splendid condition, perfectly equipped, and always ready for action. A military force with which all the existing standing armies of Europe would not be able to cope can be set in motion in twenty-four hours more. Under these circumstances the theory of a balance of power has no longer any application, and the war power of Great Britain depends now almost wholly upon its fleet.

In the recent acute controversy over Upper Silesia, when France was urging military intervention in order to make sure that the region should not go to Germany, Mr. Lloyd George repeatedly declared that, if military pressure were actually to be applied, Great Britain must not be counted upon to furnish more than a battalion or two. Will Great Britain under these conditions consent to weaken its only remaining arm of defence, namely, its navy? Europe frankly thinks not. It has no idea whatever that Mr. Lloyd George will enter into any agreement by which Great Britain, deprived of whatever protection a balance of power once afforded, will lessen its ability promptly to blockade the European coast, close the Mediterranean, and control the seas.

PUBLIC opinion in Europe appears to be equally skeptical regarding the attitude of the United States and Japan, once the position of Great Britain is made clear. Under the surface of all discussion of international questions of the larger sort one detects the suspicion amounting in many quarters to a conviction, that Great Britain and the United States are at bottom the two great world rivals, and that a struggle for supremacy is not in the long run to be averted. That a war between the two great English-speaking nations would be an unspeakable calamity is everywhere admitted, but Europe has known calamities and is not deterred from speculating about others that may possibly occur. It inclines to the belief that, in spite of all the differences of language, history and environment, here is more in common between France and America than there is between England and America, and it looks to see rapprochement on the one side as the rift widens on the other.

That only means, however, from the standpoint of the Washington Conference, that if Great Britain will not curtail its naval program, neither will the United States abandon its present purpose of building the greatest navy in the world. As Europe sees the matter, the American navy must be big enough to give the British navy pause, or America must continue to be subject, as for years it has been subject, to British foreign and colonial policy. No one believes that the United States, now that it has somewhat tested its strength and its resources in a great war, will long continue to knuckle down to Downing Street.

The Japanese problem seems more remote. What Japan does in the Pacific is only indirectly a concern of Europe, and in any case no one seriously anticipates the appearance of a Japanese army on European soil or of a hostile Japanese fleet in European waters. There is a fairly general impression in Europe, however, that the political ambitions of Japan, as they enfold themselves, joined to the undoubted pressure for an outlet for Japanese emigration, will be found to be invincibly opposed to the policies of Great Britain and the United States in the Pacific part of the world, and that neither of the three powers will be particularly averse to trying conclusions at arms when the occasion arises. But that does not mean disarmament. On the contrary, it means the continuance of naval construction on a great scale, not only on the part of Japan, which will have a policy to enforce, but also on the part of Great Britain and the United States, which will have a policy to defeat.

THE necessity of safeguarding the territorial integrity of China, to which in spite of the Shantung incident the greater powers of Europe are on the whole committed, is looked upon as a further argument in favor of keeping naval strength intact and adding to it as much as possible. If Great Britain and America will not disarm, certainly Japan will not do so. As for the rest of the world, it is the great powers that lead the way, and what the great powers do the lesser ones may be counted to do also.

Thus, in substance, reasons the public opinion of Europe. Yet, with all its doubts, Europe continues to follow with close attention every move which the summoning of the Washington Conference calls forth. Never, perhaps, was there so much need of a breath of fresh air in the superheated political atmosphere of Europe, never so much need for words of wisdom, moderation and decision which shall show a distracted continent the way to freedom and peace.

And whence shall come the refreshing breeze and the helpful words if not from America? Not, surely, from France, already launched forth upon an imperialistic program from which only the strongest influences, material as well as moral, can deter it. Not from Great Britain, hesitating at the crossroads, doubtful of which way it should turn. Not from any of the lesser states of Europe, whose claims to be heard in international decisions are as yet at best only tolerated. The hour belongs to America, and it is to America that Europe looks with pathetic hope.

| $\frac{1}{2}$ cup shortening        | 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder                                                |
| $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups sugar           | 1 cup milk                                                                     |
| Grated rind of $\frac{1}{2}$ orange | $1\frac{1}{2}$ squares ( $1\frac{1}{2}$ oz.) of unsweetened chocolate (melted) |
| 1 egg and 1 yolk                    | $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon salt                                                    |
| $2\frac{1}{2}$ cups flour           |                                                                                |

Cream shortening, add sugar and grated orange rind. Add beaten egg yolks. Sift together flour, salt and Royal Baking Powder and add alternately with the milk; lastly fold in beaten egg white. Divide batter into two parts. To one part add the chocolate. Put by tablespoonfuls, alternating dark and light batter, into three greased layer cake pans. Bake in moderate oven 20 minutes.

FILLING AND ICING

|----------------------------------------------------------|-----------------------------------------|
| 3 tablespoons melted butter                              | 1 egg white                             |
| 3 cups confectioner's sugar                              | 3 squares (3 oz.) unsweetened chocolate |
| 2 tablespoons orange juice                               |                                         |
| Grated rind of $\frac{1}{2}$ orange and pulp of 1 orange |                                         |

Put butter, sugar, orange juice and rind into bowl. Cut pulp from orange, removing skin and seeds, and add. Beat all together until smooth. Fold in beaten egg white. Spread this icing on layer used for top of cake. While icing is soft, sprinkle with unsweetened chocolate shaved in fine pieces with sharp knife (use  $\frac{1}{2}$  square). To remaining icing add  $2\frac{1}{2}$  squares unsweetened chocolate which has been melted. Spread this thickly between layers and on sides of cake.

The Bible Transported and Transmitted

Read "The Bible and Missions," by Montgomery.

CHRISTIANS have ever been people of the Book. Wherever the missionary goes, there goes, of course, the Bible. Wherever the Bible goes, there follows civilization. Space does not permit even the barest outline of Christian progress and righteous civilization as influenced by the Bible. No book has been translated into so many languages nor with such great difficulty. Many languages have been reduced to writing solely in order that the Bible might be made available. People of more than six hundred tongues are now reading the Word of God.

Here are some of the difficulties confronting the translators: How can one express abstract ideas like sanctification, justification, salvation, or faith in the languages of savages? In Tahitian there is no word for faith or conscience. In the Maori language there is no word for hope or law. Willis Hotchkiss sought for months for the word that meant Saviour before he could tell the people of British East Africa the story of Christ that was burning in his soul. When the Moravian missionaries in New Guinea translated the Lord's Prayer they had to substitute "Come Thou Chieftain Great" for "Thy Kingdom Come." In Alaska, where there are no sheep nor shepherds, the missionaries rendered the words of the Twenty-third Psalm by "The Lord is a first-class mountain-hunter," instead of the usual words, "The Lord is my Shepherd." In Greenland, John's words "Behold the Lamb of God" had to be rendered by substituting the name of the only animal about which the people had thoughts of tenderness, "Look, God's little seal."

The very first Bible printed in America was a translation into one of the Indian languages of New England. The translator was John Eliot. Martin Luther gave us the German Bible. William Carey learned to read the Bible in six languages and gave the Scriptures in forty languages to three hundred million people in India. Robert Morrison translated the Bible into Chinese. Cornelius Van Alan Van Dyke translated the Bible into Arabic. And so the story of patient toil, heroic endeavor and consecrated effort may be multiplied into scores of thrilling stories of missionary conquest and Kingdom achievement. Our own efforts seem insignificant in the face of what men and women have done, and are doing, and what, by the grace of God, we may all do when once we are really in earnest in our Christian life and profession.

DESTRUCTION of all gooseberry and currant bushes in its vicinity has been found to be a means of saving the white pine, one of the most valuable of American timber trees, from extermination by a fungus growth known as blister rust, which has killed many of those trees in certain areas. There is no means of saving a tree once it has been affected, but the rust can be prevented. Its life cycle requires continual alterations from the pines to gooseberry or currant bushes, going through one stage of its development on the one and the second on the other. Where there is no opportunity to make this change the pine blister dies and disappears.

pastor, and wished to take away with them the outline of a discourse the like of which might never be heard in the "provinces." It may have been a whim of the girl, probably a recent graduate from college.

Her amazement amounted to consternation, when as the text was announced, she saw the note-book in the young lady's hand and her pencil dashing over the page with the rapidity and ease acquired only by the skilled stenographer. Mrs. Wingate sat directly behind the "operator" and there could be no mistake as to the dots and dashes jotted down upon page after page. And the party had the indefinable but unmistakable air of lawful occupation of their present quarters. The hymn books and Bibles in the rack before them, she had observed, were comparatively new, handsomely bound, and upon two of them she traced names in gilt letters. Was it likely that travelers would carry with them books that belonged to a family pew? The stenographer was disposing of her pad and pencil in a pretty hand-bag when the Leading Lady accosted her in lofty patronage:

"You are a reporter! For what paper?"

The girl drew herself up with dignity; the inquirer could not have excelled in poise and iciness.

"For none!"

The two words uttered, she turned her back and took hold of her mother's elbow to escort her out of the pew.

IN SPITE of herself Mrs. Wingate was constrained by some invisible agency to glance back as she gained the inner door of the church. She was just in time to see Mrs. Haile, whose pew was on the other side of the middle aisle and nearer the pulpit, stop to shake hands with the obnoxious party, who had evidently lingered to speak with her.

Were they former parishioners? or was this just another exhibition of the eccentricities of the minister's wife regarding the duty of churchly hospitality? She made her way across the vestibule to the urbane functionary who had earned both the titles of sexton and undertaker.

She quenched his urbane smile and broke his bow in half by the peremptory demand:

"Mr. Johnson! who are those people who have sat in the Morgan pew during both services today?"

"Why, Mrs. Wingate, haven't you heard of the removal to Cincinnati of the Morgans early in January? And the Freemans took the pew immediately."

"I had heard nothing of this! May I trouble you to say to Mr. Ford that I should like to speak to him? There he is standing by the door."

The abashed official obeyed with alacrity, and Silas responded as obediently to the mandate.

"I must have a few words with you," she told him. "And out of the hearing of all these people," glancing disdainfully at the retiring, gossiping worshippers.

"Is your car here?" he inquired.

"No, I mean to walk home. The weather is so fine."

"That is all right, if you will let me escort you." Silas lifted his hat gallantly. "Mrs. Ford is not out this afternoon."

At her suggestion they turned into the first side-street beyond the church, and the fair widow lost no time in airing the grievance that had marred her spiritual enjoyment of her first Sunday at home.

"It is very strange that nobody thought to write to me of the Morgans' removal and of the subsequent changes," she began. "Somebody might have taken into consideration the fact that I must be interested in my nearest neighbors in church and that I should have been consulted before letting that pew to these very objectionable people, who, the sexton says, have taken it."

Silas had a natural desire to stand well with the great lady. He was neither parasite nor craven and he showed this at once.

"They are highly respectable, my dear madam. I have known of them for years. The father is a retired manufacturer who used to do a large business in Albany. He was crippled for life in a railway accident years ago. Then he removed to Brooklyn where he owned valuable property and lived there till last December—I think it was then the doctors fancied that the air there was too strong for his weak lungs and advised removal to Manhattan. His two sons are in Columbia. That may have had something to do with their change of location."

do with their change of location."

MRS. WINGATE'S gesture would have been impertinent in another woman. As it was, she sighed patiently! "And those unmannerly boys are intolerable!" She recounted the incident of the calendar.

Mr. Ford was immensely relieved.

"I am glad to be able to explain that! The lads came to me after the morning service to ask about the notice that the Pastor's Class for the study of Bible History illustrated by stereopticon views would meet in his study at the Church House on Friday evening, and that young men attending the church are invited to attend. I saw to it that the stereopticon was mentioned. Mr. Miller read that part of the entertainment—views of Palestine, you know. Takes tremendously! It had been running since December, but these fellows never happened to read the week-day notices before, you see. So they rushed up to me to know how they could join the class."

"They are not likely to be ornaments to it," dryly. "They turned their backs to me and chuckled when I inquired of their sister for what paper she had reported the sermon."

"Great Scott!" Silas stopped short in the middle of the sidewalk. "For what paper? Whew!"—catching the step and going on with her. "And what did she say?"

"She drew herself up as if she had been a duchess, and said: 'For none!'"

Silas's sense of humor rallied to his aid.

"By George! but that's a good one! That girl, Muriel Freeman, is the most devoted daughter I ever knew. I heard of her long ago through friends of mine

Here Is the Reason for the Successful 20-Year Record of a Great Food for Brain and Body

A Few Facts of Nation-Wide Interest

WHEN a food has withstood the test of over twenty years, and millions of men, women and children in all conditions of life have eaten it with relish, and thrived on it, it must have sterling merit.

There are very few foods that can fulfill all the requirements of a complete diet. Grape-Nuts, with cream or milk, is one of these few.

It furnishes an ideal diet for brain as well as muscle workers. It is rich in tissue-building elements, and in the mineral salts that nourish nerves, provide iron for the blood, and furnish phosphates for the teeth and bones.

Served Around the World

Grape-Nuts has helped the health and happiness of millions, not alone in America, but throughout many parts of the civilized world. Its delicious goodness and digestibility make it the ideal food for every person who wants to be at his best.

Go to your grocer today and get a package of rich, nutritious Grape-Nuts. Eat it as a cereal with cream or milk at breakfast, or make it into an appetizing pudding for lunch or dinner.

You can order Grape-Nuts anywhere and everywhere; in the most exclusive hotels and in the most modest lunch rooms; at the largest and the smallest grocery stores; on palatial ocean liners and small lake boats; and for all of which there is a reason.

in Marlinton where Mr. Haile used to live, you know. Her mother is a sister of Lawson—one of the principal citizens of the place. As I said, Freeman is a helpless cripple. Can't walk a step. He is a good Christian man, and it is a terrible cross to him that he can't attend church. What should this girl do but learn shorthand as if she was to earn her living as a stenographer, and she takes down sermons and lectures and all that, and reels them off like a professional, Freeman says. It's one of the finest things I've ever heard of. Her father fairly dotes on her, as well he may! She'll be an heiress when he dies, but she'd be a treasure as a wife if she hadn't a cent."

Mrs. Wingate quickened her pace. "Perhaps you are right, but I don't fancy them as neighbors in church. They ruined that superb anthem for me this morning. I should regret to change my pew for another, but I cannot keep it under these conditions. I am surprised that they were allowed to select one in the middle aisle."

With which stunning threat she bade him "Good-day" at her door and swept majestically off. The stricken man was left rooted to the pavement.

IT WAS generally accepted as a social rule in the parish that a pastor who had preached twice in the same day should have no further trial of his strength of body and of mind in the form of professional calls in the evening, unless some case of extreme importance excused the trespass. Silas Ford had no scruples as to the errand that took him to the Parsonage that evening. He was conducted to the second story "living-room," one of the very few thus called that have a just claim to the title. His heart smote him as Haile arose from the lounge on which he was stretched—his wife's well-modulated voice, in itself balm and tonic, reading to him from George Herbert's Poems.

"I know I had no business to come!" began the intruder, penitently. "But I have been that worried for some hours that I couldn't hold out any longer. No, Mrs. Haile!"—as she rose as if to quit the room. "This is a difficulty in which we may need your advice. Women understand each others' whims better than men can."

A shade flitted across Stuart's face and his wife glanced apprehensively toward her husband. A trial of temper and patience was ahead of him, and such often were more intolerable than a trial of faith. Unsolicited she drew nearer the lounge upon which Stuart now sat upright.

Silas told his story in businesslike way and dispassionate as a newspaper report of a sale of stocks. His comments when the facts were "in" betrayed real perturbation.

"Of course there's no use in denying that if an ordinary member—say from the side aisles or the gallery—had entered this complaint, we wouldn't give it a second thought. It would, as we might say, be laughed out of court. For the Freemans have sat in that pew for more than three months and never a word has been said against them. I told as many as a dozen first and last how the daughter carries shorthand reports of sermons to her father, and the comfort he gets out of them. Not a 'peep' have I heard from high or low!

"But this complaint comes from high quarters. We all know what a power Mrs. Wingate is in the church and in society outside of the Banner. If she sets a-going a tale like that she handed out to me, there's no telling what mischief it might do. It must be stopped by fair means or foul. She wouldn't like to have me say that she was mad as a hatter this afternoon, but it's gospel truth. It popped into my head as I came along, that maybe you might contrive to get the Freemans to select another pew. There's one nearer the pulpit in the right-hand aisle where the old lady could hear better than where she is. You might put that before her. And it is a fact that the middle aisle is draughty. You might work that, too. I stand for the statement that we have a bigger offer for the pew they are in, and don't like to refuse it. I'll be responsible for the money, if need be. You know, Mr. Haile, what interests of that kind are to me. I'd do ten times more than pay the rent of that pew twice over sooner than have the row and the scandal that would be raised if this fracas comes to light. Lord! I can hear Miss Maynard and Albertha Briggs chirp and twitter!"

THE incumbent of the Banner pulpit had by nature a fiery temper of his own that sometimes got the better of grace and habit. It was—as his interlocutor would have put it—"on the move" at the present instant. The alarmed wife laid a restraining grasp upon his shoulder. He shook it off. His fists were closed in a most ungodly grip.

"Do I understand, Mr. Ford, that I am expected to undertake what would be a dirty job in any circumstances and in any rank of so-called society, in order to smooth the ruffled plumes of an angry woman who objects to the proximity, in the house of God, of inoffensive people who are every whit as respectable in their sphere as she is in hers—her fellow Christians whose manners do not coincide with her arbitrary code of deportment? I refuse to take a hand in the shameless diplomacy that is to oust them and gratify an unworthy whim. It is that, and nothing else, according to your own confession. You introduced the subject by speaking of it as a woman's whim. My dear friend!"—the sight of the blanched face that had been ruddy five minutes before cooling him somewhat. "You cannot expect or desire this thing when you have shaken yourself free from the spell that was laid upon you today. It is so unlike your honest, right-minded self that I cannot trust the evidences of my own senses. As to lending myself to the conspiracy, I refuse again point-blank now and always. I will sooner resign my charge!"

The Disciples' Convention

By REV. S. O. WELLS

THE first annual convention of the Disciples of Christ, under the operation of the new United Christian Missionary Society, was held recently at the assembly grounds at Winona Lake, Ind. The attendance was large—it was said by cottagers on the grounds, the largest of its kind in the experience of Winona Lake—being estimated at seven thousand.

The United Christian Missionary Society, into which nearly all the former national missionary agencies of the Disciples of Christ were merged, began its operation October 1, 1920; therefore the reports presented of work cover only nine months, from October to June inclusive. Notwithstanding the financial depression, the setting up of new missionary machinery, and readjustments in general of all missionary operations, the reports were the best the organization has ever made, as compared with those of any like period.

The reports showed more money contributed for all purposes than ever before, more churches built, and more souls won by evangelism. Jesse M. Bader, superintendent of evangelistic work, stated that something over 120,000 had been brought into the churches in the last nine months.

One of the changes in policy announced—and one that seemed to meet with general approval—provides for country-wide conferences on stewardship and the abandonment of the former policy of missionary apportionments by the Society.

Another of the new notes struck was the emphasis laid upon the program of evangelism. The slogan is "A million more souls for Christ in five years."

Many fine addresses and sermons were delivered during the Convention. Among the speakers were: Dr. F. B. Meyer, of London, England; Dean Brown, of Yale Divinity School; Dr. R. L. Kelly, Secretary of the Council of Church Boards of Education; and William Jennings Bryan. Many said Mr. Bryan's was the most effective speech they had ever heard in defense of the Bible as the Word of God.

Making Money At Pleasant Home Work

The Actual Experience of a Busy Housewife Who Wanted to Turn Her Spare Moments into Cash

MRS. HENRY KELLY, of Michigan, wanted a washing machine—a fine electric one that would take the drudgery out of Monday morning.

For a long time she had been planning for the machine and waiting patiently for a time when the family finances would permit her to buy it. But things didn't look very bright. Her husband's wages were barely sufficient to meet expenses. And try as she would, Mrs. Kelly could not save the money out of her household allowance.

Finally one day Mrs. Kelly had an idea. Why not earn the money herself, in spare time, to buy the electric washing machine and perhaps some other things she was needing badly? "Oh, if I only could," she exclaimed, "I would be the proudest woman in the whole town!"

When she talked to her husband about it, he smiled good-naturedly. "But what could you do, dear?" he asked. "You have all of your housework, you know. How can you make money and look after your home at the same time?"

"I—I don't know," Mrs. Kelly confessed, "but surely there must be some way to earn something in my spare time. I am going to find out."

A Plan to Earn Money

"I didn't have the slightest idea how to go about making money," Mrs. Kelly writes, "but I started reading all the papers, looking for some kind of work I could do at home. At last one day I found something that seemed to just fit my case. It was a plan to earn money in spare time, knitting wool socks on a machine called the Auto-Knitter."

"I sent right away for particulars and soon had a letter from the company with some printed matter telling all about their proposition. The company agreed to buy all of the standard wool socks knit on their machine and sent to them, paying for these socks at a fixed price. They also furnished yarn to replace that used in knitting the socks.

"Well," I said to myself, 'this is surely what I have been looking for.' So I sent right away for an Auto-Knitter, and prepared to go to work earning money.

"I had really and truly earned $17.38—all by myself."

Getting the Right Start

"After a little practice I was able to work the knitter very easily. Soon I could knit a pair of socks in less than thirty minutes. Then I began to work in real earnest."

"I was surprised to find how much spare time I had, simply by planning my work. I made the most of those spare moments between household duties, moments that usually are wasted. In this way I was able to devote a few hours every day to my knitting."

The First Check

"Almost before I realized it, my first shipment was ready to send to the Auto-Knitter Hosiery Company. I was so happy I could scarcely wait until I got to the post office to send off the package. A few days of eager waiting and then came my first check. I had really and truly earned $17.38 all by myself. And without neglecting my home and household duties."

"That night I showed the check to my husband and he was just as pleased as I was. I told him it was the start on my washing machine. 'And I carefully laid the money away for that purpose. When I had earned enough to buy a washing machine—the fine electric one I had been admiring for so long—I surely was happy. After I got my machine I found that I had even more time to knit. So I kept on turning spare moments into money. As the checks came in, I bought pretty new clothes for myself, and many attractive things for the house. It is wonderful to make money this way; I can pick up my work and leave it whenever I want to. It doesn't interfere with my household duties at all. I can never be thankful enough that I didn't put off writing to the Auto-Knitter Hosiery Company when I wanted to earn 'extra money' for my washing machine."

Mrs. Kelly's experience, told here in her own words, points the way to many other folks who want and need "extra money." Women who are "tied down" with household duties and children to care for still may convert spare time into cash, in pleasant, congenial homework. Men who find their incomes insufficient to meet expenses may add to their earnings by running the Auto-Knitter an hour or so each evening. Here is an occupation where you are the boss. You are working for yourself, and you set your own wages. The size of your checks are in proportion to the amount of time and effort you devote to the work. There is a waiting market, the year around, for every standard sock you can produce.

Do You Want Extra Dollars?

Haven't you often said to yourself, "Oh, I wish we had just a little more money?" There are so many uses for "a few extra dollars" each month. Perhaps a new rug is needed for the living room; or your daughter would like piano lessons; or you really must have a new dress for Sunday wear. Wouldn't it be fine to earn the money yourself for these things—and to do it right at home in spare time?

Auto-Knitting is a tested way to make money at home. The knitter itself is a remarkable little machine, ideal for spare-time work. If correctly used, according to our simple instructions, the Auto-Knitter is guaranteed to work perfectly. The complete sock top, body, heel and toe—may be knit without removing the work from the machine.

And remember, the company agrees in writing to take every standard sock you turn out—and pay you a fixed price.

"When I had earned the washing machine I surely was happy."

Solve The Puzzle

$1000.00

How Many Objects Starting With "S" Can You Find in Picture? Larger Copies of the Picture Sent on Request

The picture here contains a number of objects beginning with the letter "S." Pick out objects like shoes, stockings, stool, etc. Nothing is hidden. Make a list of all the objects you can see. Have the whole family join in and see who gets the most. The one who gets the largest and nearest correct list wins first prize; second best list, second prize, etc.

EVERYBODY JOIN IN

This picture puzzle game is really not a puzzle at all, for all the objects and parts of objects can be seen. All you need to do is to look sharply at the picture. Your ability to find "S" Words determines the prize you win. Everybody can join in. It costs nothing to try, and if the judges decide that you have the nearest correct list you will win $20.00. However, below, you will find full particulars on how to win the $1,000.00.

The object of this picture puzzle game is to introduce and get more people acquainted with Minnesota Fountain Pens. Thousands of them are now giving satisfactory service every day. We want you to buy one of our pens, and in order to make the purchase of one of these easy writing pens doubly attractive we are making this special offer:

HOW TO WIN THE $1,000.00

If the judges decide that your answer to this puzzle picture is the best and you have purchased one of our $5.00 Minnesota Fountain Pens, during this contest, you will win $1,000.00. This offer is genuine, and there are no strings attached to it. An order for a $5.00 Minnesota Pen is all that is required to make your answer to the picture puzzle eligible for the $1,000.00 prize. If you do not care to invest $5.00 in a fountain pen, the purchase of one of our $3.00 Minnesota Fountain Pens will qualify your list of words for the $300.00 prize. Get busy now, and see how many "S" Words you can find.

MINNESOTA THE EASY WRITING FOUNTAIN PEN

The Minnesota is as good a fountain pen as you can buy, and the price is right. Once you use it, you will never be without it. The patented locking device on the filling lever is an excellent feature and you will appreciate the easy flow of the ink. Our pens are now in use in every state in the Union, and giving excellent satisfaction. Your dealer does not handle them as yet, but he will in a few months.

SEND YOUR ORDER BY NOV. 12TH

The earlier you mail your answer to the puzzle and your remittance for a pen the better. The contest closes on November 12th. When ordering be sure to state whether you want a ladies' or gentlemen's size, and whether you want a fine, medium or stub point. Special points can be had for fifty cents additional.

GUARANTEE

We guarantee Minnesota Fountain Pens to be perfectly satisfactory. If you are not satisfied with it on arrival, return it and we will exchange it or refund your money.

MINNESOTA PEN COMPANY

Department 510

245 West Fourth Street - ST. PAUL, MINN.

OBSERVE THESE RULES

1. Any person residing outside of St. Paul who is not an employee, or relative of any employee of the Minnesota Pen Co., may submit an answer. It costs nothing to try.
2. All answers must be mailed by Nov. 12th, 1921.
3. Answers should be written on one side of the paper only, and words numbered 1, 2, 3, etc. Write your full name and address on each page in the upper right hand corner. If you desire to write anything else, use a separate sheet.
4. Only words found in the English dictionary will be counted. Do not use compound, hyphenated or obsolete words. Use either the singular or plural, but where the plural is used the singular cannot be counted, and vice versa.
5. Words of the same spelling can be used only once, even though used to designate different objects. The same object can be named only once. However, any part of the object may also be named.
6. The answer having the largest and nearest correct list of names of visible objects shown in the picture that begin with the letter "S" will be awarded first prize, etc. Neatness, style, or handwriting have no bearing upon deciding the winners.
7. Candidates may co-operate in answering the puzzle, but only one prize will be awarded to any one household; nor will prizes be awarded to more than one of any group outside of the family where two or more have been working together.
8. In the event of ties, the full amount of the prize will be paid each tying contestant.
9. Three well-known business men having no connection with the Minnesota Pen Co. will judge the answers submitted and award the prizes, and participants agree to accept the decision of the judges as final and conclusive. The following men have agreed to act as judges of this unique competition: F. A. Nienhauser, Vice President National Exchange Bank, St. Paul; Otto B. DeHaas, Advertising Manager Farmers Dispatch, St. Paul; J. H. Snider, Manager F. C. Harbaugh Co., Minneapolis, Minn.
10. All answers will receive the same consideration regardless of whether or not an order for a Minnesota Fountain Pen has been sent in.
11. The announcement of the prize winners and the correct list of words will be printed at the close of the contest and a copy mailed to each person purchasing a Minnesota Fountain Pen.

Strong Drink in a Nation's Life

International Sunday-School Lesson for October 30

World Temperance Sunday. Isa. 28:1-13

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

TEMPERANCE teaching is a feature in the graded Sunday-school lessons, coming in suitable places in the scheme of the various departments. In the International Uniform series there is a temperance subject in each of the four quarters of the year. The lesson for the fourth quarter is fixed on World Temperance Sunday. There is an added emphasis which is always given to the lesson on that particular day.

When signing the temperance pledge was more the custom than today, the pledge would be presented to the Sunday-school members for signature on each quarterly temperance Sunday. Often the signatures were made on a large wall chart, which was framed and hung in a conspicuous place in the Sunday-school room. As many of us return to the schools of younger days we find our names below the pledge. As children were taught, in the public schools, the nature and effects of alcohol, they would naturally shun any contact with the poison. Pledge-signing ceased as propaganda when scientific temperance teaching became general.

Though the United States has adopted Prohibition as the law of the land, there is still need for instruction concerning the effects of alcoholic liquors. Facts must be restated, since new students are steadily coming forward and multitudes are coming to America from other countries. The continuance of this kind of teaching will show future generations why their fathers abolished the saloon. The quarterly temperance lesson must always be carefully prepared and taught with evident purpose. Then there are other sides to the temperance question than just the subject of alcohol.

Isaiah furnishes the lesson text as he tells Judah about the sins in Israel, the ten northern tribes. Ephraim was one of the important northern tribes and her weakened national life is pictured in the opening paragraph. In a comparatively brief siege Samaria was laid low in 722 B. C. The picture is pitiable as Isaiah shows how people and leaders wallow in their own filth, and strong drink is at the bottom of the trouble. In the ninth and tenth verses the people of Judah seem to be mocking the preacher, but he repeats their very words of "line upon line and precept upon precept." Right teachings must not be held in contempt and they must be repeated. If instructions are refused, the result is ever the same: the glorious crown is changed into a fading wreath of flowers. For an exposition of the lesson text the reader is always referred to the Sunday-school quarterly or other lesson help.

FOR world temperance information you are advised to write to some of the great temperance societies such as the headquarters of the W. C. T. U., Evanston, Ill.; Anti-Saloon League, Westerville, Ohio; National Temperance Society, 289 Fourth Avenue, New York City; or to the Temperance Board of your own denomination. In each case postage should be enclosed: twenty-five cents would not be too much, as printed matter costs money. The information that you would obtain would be of great value in presenting a lesson that would hold the interest in any class. You will also find many items by giving careful attention to the daily press. Temperance makes live, up-to-date news in these days. Get the facts from the Anti-Alcoholic Congress that was held in Switzerland last August. For example, President Schulthess, of Switzerland, in his opening address, declared that alcohol was in the first rank of obstacles hindering world pacification. He painted a despondent picture of Europe's economic situation, saying it was due largely to alcoholism.

Switzerland says that she will be the first country to follow the great example of dry America. The requisite number of petitions have been secured by the Swiss temperance societies to make certain that the question of a referendum on the subject will be brought before Parliament, and eventually submitted to a vote of Swiss electors. The cost of the curse came especially before that people in the report of the medical superintendent of one of the largest Swiss insane asylums, who says that the cause of mental disease in 33 per cent. of the patients last year was alcoholism. The Swiss are finding out that the money received from licenses is more than expended in attempting to cope with the effects of the traffic. The tax-payer who must meet the bills should rise up everywhere and demand the overthrow of the legalized drink evil on the basis of the abused cry of personal liberty. The world has paid the awful costs all too long and should now become free.

THE Christian Endeavor slogan, "A Saloonless Nation by 1920" has given place to the call for a "Dry World by 1925," and pray God that it may come sooner. The theme for today's lesson assigned to the intermediates and seniors is "Enforcing Prohibition," and the topic for young people and adults is "World Prohibition." These are splendid topics for class discussion. Fallacies fall before facts. Edward F. Bowers, M. D., makes a sweeping statement when he declared "Twentieth century expert medical testimony renders its final verdict in this: Alcohol has no helpful function to perform for the human system, either in health or disease, as a beverage or as a medicine, under any circumstances, in any form or quantity, or under any condition." When the writer was in college, twenty-eight years ago, J. J. Stephenson, Ph. D., Professor in Physiology, stated, when asked by a student if he would take alcohol in sickness, "Yes, but under the advice of a physician who is prejudiced against it." Today such a conservative statement would be unscientific.

Lack of sustained effort is one of the sins in America. There is wonderful enthusiasm during a drive and then interest lessens when the time comes for a prolonged, steady pull. This sustained effort is absolutely essential in all reform work. Continuous liberty must always be paid for by eternal vigilance. During the Great War the flag was often saluted. It would be a good thing if each Sunday school or department of the school would set forth the fact of the Eighteenth Amendment and with all that is involved in mind, again salute Old Glory. Respect for the Law must be the mental attitude of our growing young people if we are to have law-abiding men and women. The Sunday school holds a strategic place in the work for law enforcement. There must be a sober world before there can be a Christian world. American missionaries are even more highly regarded in non-Christian lands, now that alcoholic liquor cannot be exported to those countries from the United States.

The story of the Rechabites, Jeremiah 35:1-11, is the subject assigned for the primaries and juniors. It is also a good story to tell in the other departments in connection with the general presentation of this temperance lesson.

GOSPEL Signboard campaigns are being planned in various parts of the country, as preliminary steps looking to a coming revival. The boards are 30 x 10 feet, lettered in black, with a white background and blue border, the reading matter to consist exclusively of striking passages from the Bible. These "Silent Evangelists" are expected to be used in many cities, the management of the movement being undertaken in each locality by a committee of the churches, and the costs met by voluntary contributions.

Free Circulars for Investors

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address, on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address Financial Department. The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2, describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To Invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co., 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent. are described in Circular 28.

Deere & Co., 10-year gold notes to yield 8.40%. Business, farm implements. Founded by John Deere in 1837. Ask for Circular No. 51.

Circular No. 50 gives complete information on Federal Farm Loan Bonds. They pay 5% and are tax exempt.

Farm Mortgages—details also circulars regarding 6 per cent. First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Send for Circular 38.

Foreign Bonds—opportunities for obtaining Foreign Municipal Bonds with yearly drawings at par giving high average yield of 12 1/4 per cent.—Danish Internal Loans, Norwegian and Scandinavian Bonds. Booklet 48.

Questions and Answers

MANY readers are writing us with reference to the Disarmament Conference. We would ask all who are interested to urge forward the signing of the resolutions by their churches and the various women's organizations, that the whole may be completed in time.

Miss S. K. P., Yonkers, N. Y., writes: "What are Christian people, not identified with any particular church, to do when they wish to indicate their approval of President Harding's action as to Disarmament? Please give an answer in your next issue."

For Christian people who desire to indicate their approval of the President's course on Peace and Disarmament, we would suggest that they should meet together in groups, and give formal endorsement and forward the same to the Christian Herald. It might be well, in signing, to state that such signatories are Christian people and in hearty sympathy with the movement.

G. W. K., Buffalo, N. Y., writes: "The first real step toward a lasting peace throughout the world has been taken by the United States. President Harding has called a Conference of the Powers to discuss plans for reducing the armies and navies of the world. Some such plan has already been urged in a petition signed by over 20,000 ministers, and I am sure is endorsed by every Christian and right thinking person in our land. These great men who will sit at the Conference in Washington will have one purpose in mind—to make wars such as we have lately experienced impossible. These men will need encouragement. They will need the prayers of every Christian. These we will give gladly; but they will also need some visible demonstration to show that their labors have our hearty endorsement. This can be done in no better way than by displaying the American flag during the time that this Conference is in session. Let every Christian and American citizen fling to the breeze the American emblem, thus giving silent expression of his prayers and good-will toward the Conference. I can see no better way of bringing this suggestion before the people throughout the country than through the Christian Herald."

Q. J. C., Hopkinton, Mass., writes: "Why go for Limitation of Armament? Why not give a clear testimony for Disarmament, pure and simple—complete, immediate? It is the only safe way, because it is the right way. Do not wait for the Conference. It is easier to do right today than tomorrow. Remember this time that you are dealing not with opinion or policy, but with spiritual law which brooks no compromise. The Leader of men will have the whole heart or none. He bestows His gifts of freedom and power on the sole condition of entire consecration. Go into your closet and shut the door. Then, when you come forth and speak, you will not disappoint us again."

F. A. L., Albion, Me. "Familiar Spirits" are mentioned in several Bible passages. The wizards, sorcerers, necromancers, and other impostors of those days pretended to get information and to make important revelations for their dupes through spirits called from the other world. There are repeated warnings in Scriptures against having any dealings with this class of charlatans. See Lev. 30:31, Isa. 8:19, etc. The same class of impostors still exists today, although the spread of intelligence and the laws of civilization keep them in check.

Mrs. A. H., Tallahassee, Fla. The condition of unemployment which we are now facing is one of the legacies of the great war. While the world conflict raged, existing industries were driven to greater production and many new industries were started; wages rose everywhere and prices mounted in proportion. Now we are in the midst of the reconstruction, with many industries idle or nearly so, production reduced generally, all prices tending downward, and wages also. It is not surprising that many are unemployed, when we consider the situation calmly. Yet, as statistics show, the country has a smaller proportion of unemployed today than in 1914. National leaders have held a Conference on Unemployment to help relieve the situation, and an early improvement is looked for. Meanwhile, it is the duty of every citizen to do what lies in his or her power to aid in this direction, not by pauperizing the unemployed, but by giving them work. The Bowery Mission Labor Bureau, one of the most useful organizations built up by Christian Herald readers, is doing all that lies in its power in finding jobs for the unemployed, and has been doing so for many months past, but the supply of workers far exceeds the demand.

Subscriber, Cheney, Wash. Write to Pension Bureau, Washington, D. C., for the information.

C. W. L., Cedar, Mich., writes: "To a person wishing to put in say $100 a year toward Native Missionary support, to whom would you refer me, so I can get in touch with him or them—either India, Japan, or South America?"

For India write to Rev. R. A. Hume, Ahmednagar, India; for Japan write to Rev. Robert Atchison, of the Japan Interior Mission, Osaka, Japan. For South America, write to Rev. Mr. Bach, South American Mission, Maracaibo, Venezuela, S. A. All three are at the head of very progressive organizations and will be glad to answer your letters. You may wish to divide your gift among them equally, or to send to one field only.

Mrs. W. C., Ocean View, Va. The statement is made concerning the disciples whom Jesus met on the way to Emmaus (Luke 24:16) after the resurrection, that "their eyes were holden" that they should not know Him. One commentator expresses the situation thus: "Certainly they did not believe that Jesus was alive, and His company as a fellow traveler was the last thing they would expect. But the words 'their eyes were holden' and another expression in Mark 16:12, make it evident that there was a divine operation hindering the recognition of Him until the fitting time." They had had their eyes fixed so exclusively on the glories in prospect that they overlooked the sufferings which the prophets foretold must take place. It was not until Jesus broke bread with them in their home that they recognized Him as their Risen Lord, and then began to reproach themselves with their failure to know Him as He spoke to them on the way.

P. J. L., Englewood, N. J., sends the following remembered verses from another old version of the Bible books in rhyme. Although incomplete, it is interesting as showing the loving pains our forefathers took to preserve the memories of the books in their order. The sender writes: "Many years ago, I learned by heart the inclosed verses, and send them to you to see if any one can fill in what I have forgotten."

In Genesis, mark the beginning,
In Exodus, see Israel sinning.
Leviticus and Numbers show
Those laws Jehovah spake below.
In Deuteronomy behold
Those laws a second time enrolled;
And here the Pentateuch of Moses
With its great author's history closes.
Next Joshua takes the promised land.
Three hundred years the Judges stand.
Ruth among the sheaves is seen
Praising God with her sweet mien.
In Samuel's book is pictured all
The fortunes of himself and Saul.
Of Kings succeed a numerous race
Whose deeds through Chronicles we trace.
Next Ezra doth God's standard wave,
And Nehemiah patriots brave
Who raise the second temple fair
And Salem's holy walls repair.
Next Esther's royal name is found
For beauty and for worth renowned.
Job lifts an ancient scroll sublime
Unknown its author, source or time.
Isaiah's lips were touched with fire,
Grief-struck was Jeremiah's lyre.
In Lamentations low and tender
He mourns o'er Zion's ruined splendor.
In Babylon, Ezekiel saw
Visions that filled his soul with awe.
And Daniel's pen records so plain
The glories of Messiah's reign.
From sublime Habbukuk there flowed
His burden and his lofty ode.
Zephaniah's voice of terror
Proclaimed that wrath should light on error."

The Beautiful 1922 Scripture Text Calendar

AND THOUGHTS FOR DAILY MEDITATION
IT IS ALL READY FOR MAILING

DAILY WORDS OF CHEER

THE Scripture Text Calendar for 1922, with its combination of the beauties of art with the daily words of inspiration from the Bible, will, we think, meet with general approval. The art work, including both the front page and the inside pictures, is reproduced in the beautiful four-color process printing.

THE SCULPTOR'S WORK

THE pages showing the dates for each month were modeled in clay by a well-known sculptor, and the reproduction of this bas-relief work adds much to the beauty of the calendar.

COVER DESIGN

A REPRODUCTION of the famous painting, "Master, I Perish," is the principal feature of the cover design of the Scripture Text Calendar. The accompanying reproduction of the front page speaks for itself, although we call your attention to the general consistency of the design and the artistic effect produced by the combination of beautiful colors on the calendar when you get it.

As an adornment for the walls of the home, this famous picture, artistically adapted to the cover design of the Scripture Text Calendar for 1922, is one which speaks eloquently, conveying to the beholder a suggestion of hope and good cheer.

TWELVE WORKS OF ART

BESIDES the cover design, the calendar contains a four-color picture for each month. We present herewith a list of these works of art:

JANUARY—Christ Healing the Sick Child.
FEBRUARY—Returning from Jerusalem.
MARCH—The Story of the Good Samaritan.
APRIL—He Is Risen.
MAY—Christ Teaching Little Children.
JUNE—The Son of a Carpenter.
JULY—Christ Going Through the Wheat Field.
AUGUST—Christ and the Fallen Woman.
SEPTEMBER—Jesus Sitting by the Sea of Galilee.
OCTOBER—The Rainbow Promise.
NOVEMBER—The Story of Jacob's Ladder.
DECEMBER—The Holy Night.

By referring to the Scripture Text Calendar you can tell what the Sunday School Lesson will be for any Sunday in 1922—an aid to the busy teacher.

A 200-YEAR CALENDAR

ON THE back of the Calendar is a 200-Year Calendar, by the use of which you can locate the day of the week on which you were born, or any important event in recent history; in fact, the dates within two centuries. A table of the Easter Sundays between 1860 and 1955 is given; also a table showing Standard Time Around the World. These educational features add to the practical utility of the calendar and enhance its value to old and young.

Actual size 16 x 9 1/4 inches. Every page printed on fine enameled paper in full colors.

The young generation of Japanese in Hawaii plays with the zest of the American boy—and it's the same game the American lad enjoys

The Japanese Problem in Hawaii

How the Task of Christianizing and Americanizing the Oriental Is Progressing

By REV. U. G. MURPHY

FOR many years, in common with other church workers, I endeavored to harmonize the conflicting reports coming from Hawaii relative to social, moral, racial and religious conditions on the islands. But finally I came to the conclusion that the only way one could get any definite, concrete idea of Hawaiian conditions would be to spend some time there. Hence when the American Bible Society suggested that I might be of some service in a Bible-selling campaign on the islands I lost no time in accepting the offer.

Since I had spent fourteen years in Japan, and several years on the Pacific coast in somewhat close association with the Japanese, it was the idea of the Society that in Hawaii I should do most of my work among the Japanese. I took with me 2,000 testaments in English for the Hawaiian-born of Japanese parentage and the Society had 25 cases of Japanese testaments shipped in from Yokohama.

It soon became apparent that the six weeks I had innocently allotted myself as sufficient to cover the islands would not do at all, and I added two more weeks to the six. Four months would have been much better, and if I try this kind of a job again, I shall endeavor to arrange for more time.

Having been accustomed to work among the Japanese on the Coast, visiting their saw mill, farm, railroad and fish-cannery camps, I thought I would know how to handle the camps I had heard so much about in Hawaii. But I soon discovered that camps in the United States and camps in Hawaii are very different things. On the mainland Japanese camps have Japanese foremen, or bookmen, as they are now called; but in Hawaii the foreman, or "luna," is generally a Portuguese, or a Portuguese-Hawaiian; and of all the many race mixtures one finds in Hawaii the Portuguese-Hawaiian is admittedly the worst.

There are several reasons why the Hawaiian-born Japanese boys and girls do not take kindly to plantation labor, but one of the chief reasons is the objection to the kind of lunas who oversee the work of the laborers. It is not reasonable to expect the grammar school graduate to be content to be bossed by the type of overseer one generally meets on the average plantation, and there is little hope that the trend away from the plantation will cease until laborers have lunas of their own nationality. I found that where work is done by contract both employers and employees are better satisfied, just as is the case on the mainland. Japanese do better work where they are trusted and can arrange their own hours and methods.

AS THE Japanese are handled by overseers of other nationalities, there was no opportunity of approaching them through their own representatives. On the mainland the whole matter is very simple. All I need to do is to notify the bookman as to the time of my arrival, and he attends to the rest. A good audience is generally assured, but this not being possible in Hawaii, I had to adopt other methods of securing a hearing. In fact, if there are methods of securing an audience that I did not employ in Hawaii, I do not recall them now. When a meeting was not possible, I visited from house to house, a very tiresome, slow, though very effective method.

Visiting the camps from house to house, however, has decided drawbacks, as generally both the husband and wife work in the fields. At the wages paid until recently this has been necessary in order to make a living. The children get off early to the Japanese language school, which, until recently when the new law regulating such schools went into effect, opened at 7 a. m. Work in the fields begins at 6 a. m. the year round and continues, with a half-hour rest at noon, until 4:30 p. m. This means that most of the people are away from home all day, except Sundays. Very naturally under the circumstances, visiting the homes cannot be very successful; but somehow I made headway at that kind of Bible evangelism.

I found that even fewer Bibles were in the possession of the Japanese than had been estimated. The workers on the field had estimated that about seven per cent. of the Japanese had Bibles or Testaments when I arrived. I frequently found camps where only one family in 20, and sometimes one in 30, had a copy of the Japanese New Testament. No such condition could be found in any but the most isolated places in Japan, if at all.

Gradually I began to sense the fact that I was dealing with people who had been isolated from their home land so long that they know practically nothing of the progress Japan has made, and being ignorant of the English language, have been left almost untouched by the current of American civilization. Because of the "Gentlemen's Agreement" only a few members of families have been allowed to come to America for the past fifteen years, still further accentuating the isolation and unfamiliarity with the changes that have occurred.

After ten hours in the fields there is very little energy left for anything but the hasty meal, the hot bath and bed. Ordinarily the Japanese are voracious readers, but in the camps in Hawaii I found even newspapers comparatively scarce in the homes. The white man who told me that labor on the sugar plantations is not at all hard, either did not know or was deliberately lying. The labor is hard and in addition the heat and the rain must be taken into account. While many plantation owners are severe in their criticism of the Japanese because of the strike of a year ago, practically all are agreed that they form the best class of laborers obtainable.

I FOUND that in addition to the limited circulation of the Scriptures many localities seemed to have been practically untouched by Christian propaganda. The Buddhist temples exert a powerful influence over the Japanese. The feeling among the few Americans on the islands that the Buddhist priests are using Buddhism to hold the Japanese to their national traits and allegiance is undoubtedly warranted to a great extent. It would seem impossible that any American plantation owner should support the Buddhist temples and subsidize the priests, but I found that this has been done in many places.

If ever a man did a foolish thing it is just that. Buddhism has allied itself too closely with the Japanese national life—the most backward part of the

The Open Mind and the Conference

THERE are many very good people with firm faith in God's protecting power, who are looking forward to the coming Conference as one called to initiate complete disarmament. This is a fundamental error. It is called to consider the problem of such a reduction of armaments as will put an end to the rivalry in land power and sea power, and allocate to each nation represented in the Conference and those that may come in hereafter, the right to maintain only such forces as are necessary for the preservation of peace at home. To accomplish even this will be little short of miracle; but it will be an initial step towards that time when the heavy burdens imposed by militarism will be lifted and the implements of war will be transformed into the appliances of peaceful husbandry.

In his wise and well considered communication to Governor Farrington of Hawaii, President Harding has laid down certain definite principles which he hopes may be observed in the work of the Conference. He deprecates that particular kind of propaganda which has been so extensively resorted to with the evident purpose of prejudicing the Conference and embarrassing its work. He writes: "We have need in these times that men should think deeply. . . . The world has well nigh become a great aggregation of democracies. If democracy is to succeed, it must deserve success, by proving that it can inspire the race of common men to serious, continuous, effective consideration of the problems of common men. . . . The world is looking forward to the gathering of the nations to consider Limitation of Armament and the maintenance of World Peace. If your deliberations shall inspire a larger, a better, a more humane view of the elements which enter into the problem of peace, and at least a measurable disarmament; if you can encourage the ideal of a world permanently at peace; then you will have given a vast impetus to the efforts of statesmen who are presently to consider these problems in Washington."

Regarding the problem of the Pacific, which involves our relations with Japan, he finds it hard to imagine justifications for war in this day and age, especially in view of the world's late unhappy experiences. "The Pacific," he says, "ought to be the seat of a generous, free, open-minded competition, between the aspirations and endeavors of the oldest and the newest forms of human society."

His highest hope is that the Conference may prove "the precursor of an understanding which in our day will insure the peace of the world, the end of the frightful waste of competing armaments and the establishment of peace on earth, good-will toward men." This is a plea for the open mind in the Conference which can not pass unheeded. If the right spirit should prevail in dealing with the problems that come before it, and if it especially excludes propagandism, and with an open mind endeavors to find a way to satisfy the world's desire for peace, such a way, with God's help and blessing, will surely be found.

Concentration on arms reduction by land and sea must be the dominating purpose of the Conference. To accomplish this end it has been created. By a "reasonable limitation" the President explains, "I mean one that will result in something practicable and which there is a real chance to accomplish." All great reforms move slowly.

In the effort to accomplish this supreme task, the Conference will be fortified by the prayers of multitudes in every land under the sun. Not in the memory of any one now living has there been such a furor of prayer as exists today. From thousands of churches and their allied organizations, and from good citizens everywhere, there have come to us assurances of support for the President in his noble effort. It is the church's great opportunity. These prayers, like the arms of Aaron and Hur, who upheld the hands of Moses during a mighty struggle, will strengthen the Father of the Conference and all of his associates. May God crown their worthy efforts with the fullest measure of success!

What Causes War?

IN VIEW of the coming Conference on Disarmament to be held by representatives of the great nations at Washington, some vital questions that underlie the entire subject to be discussed are in order, and answers to them ought not to be impossible, if any practical results worth anything to mankind are to be the outcome of the discussion.

The causes of war have been often stated to be the ambition of military-minded men or of types like Frederick the Great and Napoleon to make territorial conquest and acquire glory for themselves; or the play by skillful politicians on the narrow nationalistic feeling of the people, falsely called patriotism.

But in reality the causes of war are not to be explained by simply saying a few ambitious men like Napoleon want to exhibit their military genius or find an avenue for their abnormal egoism. The real causes of war lie deeper than that.

The whole human race, as well as abnormally developed individuals, is to blame for the militaristic spirit that has prevailed through the centuries. And the underlying causes for war have been the facts of fear, hate, race prejudice, ignorance of history, and false patriotism, all in the heart of humanity.

No individual or group of individuals, no matter how much gifted with military genius or bursting with ambition could go on with a war program unless the factors of fear, hate, race feeling, ignorance, and national pride on the part of the people as a whole were present, willing to give up everything else held dear, in order to gratify those emotions. The soldiers of Frederick the Great adored him, and were eager to leave wife and children and home and business to fight. They would not have done it, however, simply out of admiration for his military power. They were willing to die in battle because they entertained in their hearts the same feelings he had, of desire for territory and national expansion, and were ready to help him steal Silesia from Maria Theresa. Napoleon's soldiers idolized the Little Corporal and died by the million for him. And yet they would not have done it if they, too, had not had the same false definition of glory that the military genius had.

In seeking the real causes of war we must indict the entire human race. The Caesars and Fredericks and Napoleons and Kaisers have a deal to answer for in the summing up of bloodshed through the senseless and wholesale murders defined as "love of country." But the people must bear their share. For men have been willing to leave their homes and suffer and die, not because they were possessed by an insane hero worship, but because they have really entertained a belief that war is a glorious thing in itself, and especially so, if in any way that they have called national rights and national glory were at stake.

There can be no hope of putting an end to war until the underlying fear and hate and ignorance and false national pride are swept out of the human heart. Napoleon has been charged up with the sacrifice of multitudes. And rightly. But the multitudes themselves believed as he did, and must bear their share of the guilt. So with all the great armies in all wars of human history. Until recent years the number of pacifists has been very small among the masses of mankind compared with the number who glorified war, and thought it splendid instead of horrible. The human race has believed in war as an institution, and has built up around it a most powerful and detailed set of established agencies to maintain it. The human race, therefore, is at heart guilty of the monstrous thing called war. And war will not cease until the heart of the human is changed in its definitions and in its purposes.

The great task of the world is more than can be compassed in any Disarmament Conference, no matter how important and international it may be. If the Disarmament Conference could be turned into a great religious revival that would really convert the assembled representatives into men who loved instead of hated, who had a feeling for mankind greater than their nationalistic ambition, if the Conference could by any possibility be of such a nature that when it was over, the representatives were willing to think in terms of the good of the whole world instead of the individual welfare of their own territory, if the Conference could by any means substitute good-will for fear, brotherly kindness for mutual suspicion, and statesmanship for diplomacy, and international prosperity for narrow patriotism, then the world might well hope that a new day was at hand.

But until the causes of war, as they still exist in the heart of mankind, are removed, all the conferences in the world will not bring peace. The Heart itself must be changed.

Conferences can not do that. Something else is needed.

What?

Less Taxes?

MR. TAX-PAYER, have you noticed that a statement from the White House in regard to the Republican Tax Revision bill, says that $1,800,000,000 have been placed on the rich citizens, and $1,200,000,000 on Mr. Average Person. By this revision bill, the taxes of all persons paying the normal income tax are reduced $20 a year, and an additional $8 is given for each child or dependent. All married people making $2,500 or less will escape the income tax, while these with three children can make $3,700 without paying Uncle Sam. "Nuisance" taxes are taken off. Ice cream, soda water, tooth paste, medicine, will no longer levy tribute. After January 1, 1922, railroad trips will be 8 per cent. less on passenger and Pullman. Taxes on tobacco, cigars, telegraph and telephone, automobiles, admissions and dues musical instruments, estates and capital stock will remain.

Now, if the revision bill had included the wiping out of the war expenses so far as the building of new battle ships and the upkeep of them is concerned, the Mr. Average Citizen might well rejoice a little. The contemplated revision will bring into the treasury as estimated, about $3,000,000,000.

Mr. Tax-Payer, did you ever try to imagine what would happen to a civilized country like ours if the people, including the Average Citizen were spared the taxes on things that the people do not need? Taxation is a vexed question and always has been in the world's history. There has never been a satisfactory plan devised. We say this with all deference to the single taxers and all other economists who have figured out ways and means for lightening the burdens of Mr. Tax-Payer.

But to our minds the tax burdens will never really be lifted until civilization learns the lesson of doing away with unnecessary expenses, including the waste of government administration. When finally all the "nuisance" taxes are listed, it will be found that prodigal waste of the people's money by the ignorant and wicked use of it by the government itself will ease Mr. Tax-Payer more than all revision of existing tax bills.

Our Sunday Evening Home Service

WHEN the Christian Herald began its Sunday Evening Home Services something over a year ago, it had long been convinced of the need of such a movement. We have seen its wonderful growth and have noted with much gratification that the thousands of little gatherings, largely in rural districts, have been a means of stimulating attendance at regular church service, and increasing membership.

A friend who has had experience at these gatherings for worship at home, writes her impressions in a very candid letter, which we believe many of our subscribers will read with interest. She says:

"From week to week I have read with great interest the good programs arranged for Sunday Services in the Home, and have wished that their use might be extended. We read much of the ministerial supply not being equal to the demand of the churches. Why could not the pastorless churches use this excellent program, either alone or in connection with the Sunday school, where that has been sustained? The sermons given are by our very best preachers of the evangelical churches.

"One or more copies of the Christian Herald, taken by such church, would be all that is necessary to install the service, though it would be very much better if many could be induced to subscribe. There is a crying need in our country for the people to do more religious reading. This is important for keeping in touch with religious news, and for sustaining and nourishing Christian life. The many magazines and papers of a secular nature, however good in their sphere, can not supply the spiritual needs of the people. We are nearing the close of another year, when many of the churches are waking to new activities, and when most of us are renewing our subscription for our favorite periodicals. Let us not forget our vacant churches, and the suggestion here given."

There are innumerable homes in which the Lord Day would be well rounded out by the setting up of Church in the house—a Family Altar at which on evening in the week, friends and neighbors might unite in prayer and praise in a service on simple lines. This is what our Sunday Evening Home Service strives to accomplish, and in this effort it welcomes every aid from its readers. If by sending the Christian Herald every week to some one in a neighborhood where such a service is needed, you discover that you have awakened the religious spirit in that home, you may be sure it will go farther and influence other lives.

There could be no better missionary work than this, right here at home and at our very doors. Tell it out and see.

A Story of a City Church

Instalment Nine

By MARION HARLAND

JUST one week and two days after the initial shock to Mrs. Wingate's sensibilities dealt by "that reporter girl" and "her insolent brothers," Mr. and Mrs. Haile returned sadly from the funeral of the invalid father of the objectionable trio. A paralytic stroke had completed the wreck of the poor maimed body.

"A blessed release, we say," said Anita to her only confidant. "But they mourn him as deeply as if he had fallen in the flower of his maturity. I shall always be thankful that I went at once to see what I could do for them. They were very lonely until Mrs. Freeman's sister and brother arrived from Albany. They will go back to their home in Brooklyn as soon as they can get ready."

Her voice failed as she swallowed a big sob.

"You are tired out, darling!" The comforter took the drooping figure into his arms. "Fix your mind upon the glorious fact that all is well with him, and that those who love him best will be most thankful for this, when the first agony of separation has subsided into resignation."

She freed herself from the embrace and showed him wet eyes flashing through angry tears.

"At present I am in a very unsanctified state of mind! What do you think Miss Maynard said to me yesterday when she called to collect my dues for the Basket Mission? She had the audacity to quote that has always been to me one of the most precious of uninspired promises: 'Whosoever will observe the wonderful providences of God shall have wonderful providences to observe,' in connection with what she spoke of as 'dear Mrs. Wingate's perplexity. She simply could not endure that those horrid people should continue to spoil her enjoyment of divine worship, yet, as Mr. Ford was lukewarm about it because he had business connection with some of their country cousins, he was at her wits' end. I told her that we had felt with her and I was morally certain that her creatures would be frozen out by her host of friends.'"

"What!"—interjected Stuart—"she had the hardihood to quote those words!"

"Yes! She was astonished at my horror. She went so far as to say that she had felt it her duty to drop a hint to some of the members of the Friday night class that the Freeman boys were not desirable associates. Darling! Are we doing the Lord's work in staying here we must countenance these things?"

Stuart had walked away to the window where he stood, hands locked behind him until she wondered she had wounded or offended him. At last he turned, his face set and grave, but with a smile in the deep eyes.

"Yet I have left me seven thousand in Israel, all the knees which have not bowed unto Baal, and very mouth which hath not kissed him."

He bent over her to say it softly to her and left her to ponder the reassurance.

CHAPTER XVII

RUPERT KING'S expedition to the Middle West and California was, as he wrote to his wife in high good humor, a howling success. Letters were exchanged between the two more frequently than had been common of late years. And the tone of them was different from the formal report of home affairs and happenings on one hand and concise recital of travel and business transactions on the other. The first letter received from his wife in Chicago was a distinct surprise, for they had parted in coldness that verged upon alienation. The bitter taste of it lingered in imagination and an acute ache lay down in his heart for days had robbed his eyes of sleep at night. The "Dear Rupert," with which the letter began was one removed from the "My dear Rupert" of her usual address.

A pleasant summary of domestic and social news was concluded by the expression of a hope that he might have a prosperous and safe journey and she was affectionately yours, Sara. Epistles of subsequent date were cheerful, chatty and cordial, and arrived three times a week.

He would not, for a while, admit to himself the change they gradually wrought in his mind and spirits—or that the woman of his choice the most attractive of her sex. He was by nature tactless, and a hard bringing-up had increased native reserve as to the soft sentiments that had no fostering care from the world in which he battled for years for a comfortable living, afterward fiercely for wealth that would give him eminence and power. His wife life was taking on a different coloring. He had been heartily in love when he married and secretly thought

"See for yourself what I am driving at. I won't trust the thing out of my hands. I shall want it again"

"A touch of something like spring fever," she observed lightly. "I am all right again."

"Needed somebody to take care of you—eh?"

She nodded gaily.

"Maybe so. You are looking healthy enough for both of us. Not a whit jaded by the nights and days of travel that would have made wrecks of some men. I hope you will enjoy home the more by contrast. The house is swept and garnished for you. That is, the spring cleaning is over and done with. I know how you hate it."

No man in his senses could have wished for a more felicitous home-coming and the ensuing three days left no room for adverse criticism. It was with a full heart that the unromantic man thanked the Giver of every good and perfect gift as he bowed his head in prayer on Sunday morning.

"And a jolly good sermon we had," he said that evening. "I made a point of attending divine service whenever I could when traveling, but found no better preaching than I got at home. I enjoy it all the more because I believe Haile to be as good a man as ever trod shoe leather."

He bore the same happy mood to his office Monday morning. In taking his seat at the desk he saw a letter bearing a special delivery stamp lying upon the top of a pile of mail. Taking it up he read "Personal" in the lower left-hand corner of the envelope.

"Nothing like making assurance doubly sure!" he muttered on breaking it open.

What Has Gone Before

SILAS FORD, the dominant figure in the fashionable Banner Church in New York City, is profoundly impressed while on a visit to Marlinton, a few miles distant, by the preaching of Rev. Stuart Haile, whose ten-year pastorate there has been extraordinarily happy and successful. The leaders of the Banner Church have determined on the resignation of their pastor, and Mr. Haile reluctantly accepts their call because of the larger opportunities for service. The Banner Church makes much of welcoming the Hailes, and stages what its members call the "Unique Demonstration" for the retiring and the incoming pastors. Mrs. Haile finds somewhat trying a lengthy call from Mrs. Wingate, who dominates the women's activities of the church, and a call from Mrs. Wingate's satellite—Miss Maynard, the parish visitor—increases her repugnance to the courting of wealth and social position so evident in the congregation. The pastor insists on devoting much of his time and energies to the poor of the parish, despite the opposition of the church's leaders, who wish him to cultivate those who will add to the social prestige of the church, and they engage an assistant pastor, Anslem Miller. Miss Albertha Briggs, a middle-aged spinster, warns Mrs. Haile that her husband is the type of man "women make fools of themselves over," and advises her to watch his mail. As she is leaving, the caller changes the address on a letter which the postman has just delivered so that it will go to Mrs. Haile. It is from Mrs. Rupert King, a frequent caller at the Haile home, and after telling of her husband's absence, asks the minister to call at her home that evening. Mrs. Haile understands the situation, and effort to cause an estrangement fails. Mrs. Wingate takes offense at the Freeman family, which occupies the pew in front of hers, and induces Silas Ford to go to the minister to ask them to move. Haile declares he will resign rather than do such a thing.

THE letter was typewritten. The typewriter is considered the safest and deadliest of modern "conveniences" laid to the hand of the assassin of reputation and happiness except the anonymous letter-writer.

"Mr. Rupert King"—began the infernal instrument unfolded by the unsuspecting recipient!—"This warning from a sincere well-wisher who cannot bear to see you grossly deceived should have come to you before had I not been foolishly sentimental. After seeing you so radiantly happy at the opera last Friday night, I felt I must leave you a little longer to the enjoyment of your Fool's Paradise. Your adoration of your bewitching wife needed no other advertisement than your eyes and smile. The same performance repeated with variations in church today determined me to act without delay. Your wife (by courtesy) is not singular in her preferences for a pastor to her legal proprietor. I could name at least ten women of like taste and practice. His daily mail equals, if it does not surpass, yours or that of any other multi-millionaire in the city that boasts more of the breed

What President Harding Expects from the Washington Conference

AS THE day for the convening of the Washington Conference on Limitation of Armaments draws near, President Harding's expectations as to what it will accomplish assume great importance. A letter by the President made public at the White House has warned the public not to expect universal disarmament, and declared: "If we can get a reasonable limitation we shall think great things have been accomplished." Defining "reasonable limitation" and outlining his hopes, he added:

"By reasonable limitation I mean something practicable that there is a chance to accomplish, rather than an ideal that there would be no chance to realize. It is necessary to deal with actualities; to do the best possible.

"Universal disarmament will be beyond hope of realization; even its desirability at this time might well be questioned. Thousands of years of history recording the wars and controversies of mankind suggest that human nature would require revolutionary organization to make universal disarmament possible. A consideration of the present state of the world must, I think, enforce the conclusion that this is not a hopeful time to undertake that kind of revolution.

"On the other hand, a world with the horrors of recent experiences seared into its mind, and staggering under the load of debt and armaments, has generously justified our hope for a favorable attitude toward the practical effort, the sincere beginning, that we are attempting. The fine spirit in which leading nations have received the invitation to meet and consider these things is altogether encouraging.

"To undertake the impossible and fail might leave our last state worse than our first. The attitude of the nations warrants confidence that we will not fail, but rather that substantial results will be accomplished, calculated to lessen the armament burden, and to reduce the danger of armed conflict. I feel that in such an effort we are entitled to the support of all people who would be glad—as I can assure you I would—to see still more accomplished if possible."

The first meeting of the American delegation to the Conference lasted for more than three hours, and that evening the delegates dined with the President at the White House. In addition to examining the work of the Government's experts and discussing questions of policy, the delegation chose Basil Miles, for several years in the diplomatic service, to be its secretary and approved the arrangements for the use of the Pan-American building as the principal meeting place of the Conference and for the use of part of the new Navy building for offices of the delegations.

The personnel of the French delegation has been announced officially, including Premier Briand as chief, former Premier Viviani as second in rank, Senator Albert Sarraut and Ambassador Jusserand. The British Government continued to delay the selection of its representatives and reports that Premier Lloyd George would come to Washington for the opening sessions refused to down, despite semi-official statements to the contrary. It seemed probable that the delay in naming the delegates was due to the Premier's desire to attend if he could get the Irish negotiations out of the way in time to permit his absence from the United Kingdom.

Senate Passes Canal Tolls Bill

SENATOR BORAH'S bill giving to vessels in the American coastwise trade the right of free passage through the Panama Canal—a question which has caused heated Congressional fights and international complications in the past—has been passed by the Senate by a vote of 47 to 37. It was a defeat for the Administration, but one which was softened by the probability that the measure would be held up in committee in the House for an indefinite period. Party lines were broken in the vote, thirty-five Republicans and twelve Democrats supporting the bill, while seventeen Republicans and twenty Democrats opposed it.

Senator Lodge, the Republican floor leader, fought the bill, declaring that its passage was neither the part of wisdom nor sound policy in view of the coming Conference on Limitation of Armaments, to which he is one of the American delegates. He argued that America had the legal right to grant free passage to its vessels, but that even the assertion of a legal right was unwise when it exposed the country to an implication of bad faith in view. Previous attempts to settle the matter by negotiation with Great Britain have failed, and the Senate rejected an amendment to authorize the President to seek arbitration of the tolls question. Senator Underwood, the Democratic floor leader and also a member of the Arms Conference delegation, supported the Borah bill.

Unemployment Conference Closes

PRESIDENT HARDING'S Unemployment Conference, which has been in session in Washington seeking means to improve industrial conditions in the United States, has adjourned sine die, after setting up a standing committee which is to continue work until the emergency has passed and which is empowered to reconvene the conference at any time. This committee also is to appoint sub-committees to handle various phases of the problem.

The work of the conference was commended by representatives of both employers and employees, and the session ended without open clashes between the spokesmen for capital and labor, although there were sharp differences of opinion regarding certain reports, especially that of the Committee on Emergency Measures by Manufacturers, the minority asserting that "there must be adopted no policy of wage reduction." A summary of accomplishments showed that mayors' emergency committees have been organized and are actively at work in thirty-one cities; that conferences between federal officials and the heads of great industries have resulted in definite steps to increase work; that the co-operation of great business associations is assured; and that several cities have undertaken steps to advance local public works.

Among the concerns which have taken steps to give employment are the United States Steel Corporation, which voted the expenditure of $10,000,000 in the extension of its manufacturing plants where costs would be fair, and the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, which plans to spend $2,000,000.

NOT A LARGE PILE, BUT WORTH $1,000,000 TO ILLICIT DRUG VENDORS
The warfare against "dope" traffickers is unrelenting, and the Federal officials in New York City have seized such large quantities of drugs in their raids that it was necessary to ship this lot to Washington for safekeeping

Senator Knox Dies

SENATOR PHILANDER CHASE KNOX of Pennsylvania, since 1901 one of the most prominent leaders of the Republican party, died at his residence in the national capital half an hour after suffering a stroke of apoplexy. The Senator had returned from Europe only three days before, apparently in excellent health, and there was no warning of the attack which ended his life. For several hours on the day of his death he had been at work at the Capitol in the room of the Senate Committee on Rules, of which he was chairman.

Born at Brownsville, Pa., in 1853, Mr. Knox was named after a famous Episcopal bishop. He began the practice of law at Pittsburgh in 1875, and rapidly built up one of the largest practices in that city. It was in 1901 that he became nationally prominent with his appointment by President McKinley to be Attorney-General of the United States, in which office he made a notable record for anti-trust prosecutions. He resigned in 1904 to accept an appointment as Senator, and served in that body until 1909, when he became Secretary of State in the Taft cabinet. He was re-elected to the Senate in 1916, and was the leader in the Senate fight against ratification of the Versailles Treaty. Recently he had been keenly interested in foreign affairs and was author of the resolution providing the basis on which the peace treaty with Germany was negotiated.

Silesian Decision Ready

A NEW storm has been precipitated by the decision of the League of Nations Council regarding the division of Upper Silesia, even in advance of the announcement of the terms of the settlement. In Germany intense anger was aroused by reports that a large part of the industrial district has been awarded to Poland, and the Wirth government was threatening to resign, which probably would mean the formation of a ministry pledged to oppose compliance with the obligations of the Versailles Treaty and the recent Wiesbaden agreement by which Germany is to assist in the restoration of France's invaded regions. Chancellor Wirth declared that without Silesia's industrial district Germany would find it impossible to meet her Treaty obligations, and Germany protested to France that under the Versailles pact Silesia could not be divided, a contention France denied.

In France there was dissatisfaction over the reported terms of the award because Poland received less than France had contended for, while the British were apprehensive of serious trouble before the decision could be made effective.

Publication of details of the decision was withheld pending exchanges among the Allied governments and the placing of troops to guard against outbreaks, but it was indicated that Poland received the southern portion of the plebiscite district and the industrial triangle was divided, as was the northern portion. There are complicated economic stipulations, some to extend over fifteen years, the execution of which is to be entrusted to a commission.

Railroad Strike Ordered

ORDERS have been issued for a strike beginning October 30 of the five most powerful railroad unions—the Railroad Trainmen, the Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, the Conductors, the Locomotive Engineers and the Switchmen—and the leaders of other unions have announced officially that they will join in the walk-out so as to make the tie-up of the nation's transportation system complete.

The order was issued following an overwhelming vote, said to be upward of ninety per cent. of the union members, in favor of a strike because of the twelve per cent. wage reduction ordered by the Federal Railroad Labor Board effective July 1. Sentiment in favor of a strike had been strengthened by the agitation by railway officials for further wage reductions, and almost at the same time the order was issued the Association of Railway Executives announced its intention to petition for a new cut in wages.

Plans for the strike provide for the division of the country into three groups, with the men of each group to go out at intervals of forty-eight hours, making the strike fully effective on November 5. All walk-outs are scheduled to begin at 6 a. m. standard time. The number of men directly affected by the order of the five big unions was 500,000, but the memberships of the other unions which threatened to go out with them would bring the total to nearly 2,000,000.

As this issue of the Christian Herald goes to press, desperate efforts are being made to avert such a national calamity but with

The Opened Fountain

A Sermon by REV. H. C. HOLLOWAY, D.D.*

TEXT—Zech. 13:1. "In that day there shall be a fountain opened."

THIS was the joyful announcement of prophecy concerning the atoning death of Jesus Christ. What a beautiful, striking figure! What an impressive picture of the great tragedy of Calvary portrayed under the master pencil of the Holy Spirit! A fountain shall be opened!

The fountain opened is the pierced side and hands and feet and crowned head of our divine Lord, for the sins of the world. It is the sacrifice of the Lamb of God that taketh away sin. See then, how this figure of a fountain sets forth the taking away of sin.

It teaches us the nature of the atonement made for sin. Water is the sign of inward cleansing and spiritual purity. Sin defiles the mind and conscience, renders us odious to God and uneasy in ourselves, as well as unfits us for communion with Him, as those who were ceremonially unclean, were shut out of the Sanctuary. Now, "behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world!" Therefore was the Son of God manifested to take away our sins. And as water purifies, so now the blood of Christ cleanses us from sin. He takes away the guilt of sin by the blood of his Cross.

In this the Gospel day, to which reference is made in the text, provision is made to cleanse all those from the pollution of sin who truly repent and believe. When Christ died on the Cross, the fountain was opened. This fountain alone contains the cleansing power for sin and uncleanness. Our blessed Lord has power on earth to forgive sins. The blood of Christ alone can purify the heart and cleanse the soul. There is no acceptance for the sinner, no cleansing for the guilty, no pardon for the penitent, no sanctification for the believer, but in the vicarious sacrifice of the Son of God.

But the blood of Christ is sanctifying as well as purifying. It is the divine laver of the believer. It not only effaces the immediate stain of guilt, but it intensifies the heart's desire for holiness. No believer can cultivate intimate communion with Christ and not experience a growing sanctification. It is, therefore, the blood of a holy sacrifice, and leaves the marks of holiness whithersoever it comes. How clearly and forcibly the apostle puts this truth! "Now the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus Christ, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting Covenant, make you perfect in every good work to do His will." And John, in his vision of the celestial world, declares, "These are they who came out of great tribulation and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb; therefore are they before the throne."

THE fountain teaches us the inexhaustible fulness and rich abundance of Christ's saving merits. He "tasted death for every man." "His blood cleanseth us from all sin." "With Him is plenteous redemption." "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool." "If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink." Thus, both as to its nature and extent, the atonement for sin is perfect. It lacks nothing to save the sinner.

Thus Christ, disdaining physical things, appeals at once to the soul with all its yearnings, its depths of despair, its claspings, its infinite outreachings, its disquietude, its longing for peace and love and joy, which nothing can satisfy this side the bosom of God, and says, "If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink." He stands over against whatever hunger and thirst there is in the moral nature of man, and says, "He that cometh to me shall never hunger and he that believeth on me shall never thirst."

The fountain teaches us the entire freeness of salvation through the atonement of Christ. It is free to all; without money and without price. It is costless, to us, but of infinite cost to Him. It is the fountain opened for sin and uncleanness. The prophetic promise has been fulfilled to a large degree. "I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys; I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water." Jesus proclaimed in Jerusalem's temple already, "If any man thirst, let him come to me and drink." To the woman at Sychar He said: "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well—a spring or fountain of water, springing up unto everlasting life."

THE vital thought of our Lord is that all whose souls are a-thirst should come to Him; not as a cistern filled up with wisdom from other sources, but to the self-supplied and divine fountain. He is more than a teacher giving instruction on all profound and practical questions. He is more than a worker of miracles, restoring sight to the blind and hearing to the deaf, and healing all manner of diseases. It is not simply new truth, or a beautiful model of holy living that Jesus offers. He offers Himself. "He gave Himself" for the world's redemption. It is from Himself that there flows forth saving and recovering influence; it is from the inexhaustible depths of His own being as the Son of God, that the thirsty race of sinful humanity may draw constant refreshment. He only can satisfy our deepest cravings.

In every human soul is a crying want—a hunger that no such husks as money, or fame, or sensual pleasures, or human philosophies can satisfy. There is a gnawing thirst that grows the keener, the longer it is trifled with. No one can escape the startling truth that he is a sinner; and "the wages of sin is death." We are so weak that we constantly stumble, and temptation trips our feet. Our best resolutions prove brittle withes. The cisterns we hewed out to hold our happiness are shattered. God put within us desires and groves, the green fields and meadows, the blooming flowers, the queenly rivers, the towering mountains in their evening silence, the rainbow, the gorgeous sunset, that sky, that cloud, that coloring, those tints that fade into each other and change even as we behold them; those lines of fire that lie in brilliant relief along the sky, as if some radiant angel had thrown aside his robe of light as he flew, or left his smile upon the cloud as he passed through the golden gates—these are all beautiful. But Nature has no object more strikingly beautiful than a fountain of water. Its soft and liquid flow, its rich fulness, its sweet music murmuring o'er its pebbled bed, its merry laugh, its sparkling purity, its refreshing coolness, its busy haste toward the sea, O how marvelously beautiful! Thus beautiful, what a picture of the moral beauty of Christ and the scheme of redemption!

Our idea of Socrates or Cæsar, of Napoleon or Washington, for distinctness of outline and vividness of impression, cannot be compared with that of Jesus. It is as transparent as the light; it is as unique as it is transparent; it is as radiant with moral beauty and sublimity as it is original. And we may safely say, there is no one thought in the intellect of the world more definite—none which it has grasped with a stronger and fonder hope—than this conception of the personal character of the great Founder of Christianity—Jesus the Son of man, Jesus the Son of God. On whatever side we behold Him, His character is new and wonderful, unlike any other in history. As the Son of the Holy One, incarnate, the brightness of the Father's glory, and the express image of His person, there dwells in Him "all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." He is God manifest in the flesh—a complete adaptation to our wants and woes, as guilty, helpless sinners.

How compassionate was He, how gentle, how forgiving, how meek, how full of tender sympathy; what a Fountain of love, how submissive to the Father's will, how faultless! A Fountain of moral beauty in this wilderness world of sin!

So also, there is wondrous moral beauty in the plan of redemption for us. How amazingly it reveals the divine love, how beautifully it harmonizes the attributes of justice and mercy in the divine character; "mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other." How strikingly it displays the dignity and value of the soul! What new capacities for pure enjoyment it bestows! What blessings of peace and love it already provides. This spiritual well-spring in the regenerated soul is the Fountain that never fails.

NEAR the pleasant farmhouse in which I spent some of my earlier life, was a remarkable spring of the purest water. In the silent night, when no eye beheld it, that spring bubbled on, and tracking its way into a neighboring meadow, made a line of living emerald. In the broiling heat of noonday it sparkled on clear and cool, in perpetual stream. In midwinter, when the snow was heaped around it, that spring never froze over; the bushes beside it were fringed with icicles, yet the fountain defied the bitter cold, and the water never failed to satisfy my thirst. Such is the fountain which our merciful Saviour has opened in the heart of every true believer. No matter what conditions of life may be thrust upon the true child of God, the spring of life and love in Christ Jesus will never fail him.

Jesus Christ alone can satisfy you. His comforting presence will soothe the sore spot, and heal your heartaches. His atoning blood guarantees your pardon. His love is the only cure for the wretched selfishness that is every one's besetting sin, and which now so much distresses our war-worn world. Of almost everything we sometimes tire, but what loyal child of the blessed Master ever tires of the fresh spring of the water of life? With joy does he ever draw from this unfailing, measureless well of salvation.

REV. R. J. Wade, D. D., Corresponding Secretary of the Committee on Conservation and Advance of the Methodist Episcopal Church, announces a national conference of the church to consider its world-wide missionary and benevolent interests to be held in Central Church of Detroit, November 15, 16 and 17. The conference will review progress of the world program outlined in the centenary period of five years. Methodists of the United States pledged in the Centenary program $108,000,000, payable in five years, and over $33,000,000 has been paid in the first two years. This will be the greatest gathering ever held between the quadrennial conferences of the Church, and three thousand Methodist leaders from all over the United States are to attend.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"In the Cross of Christ I Glory," or "Love Divine, All Love Excelling."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—I Cor. 13th Chapter: The Greatest of Christian Graces.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation—(See page 788, first column.)

Sermon—"THE OPENED FOUNTAIN"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—These may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Now the Day Is Over," or "Abide with Me."

Benediction—By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

We who have rejoiced in the power of Thy Presence during our worship here together, now crave the Benediction of the pierced hand which we know is raised over us all to protect and bless and heal with its Divine Love and Forgiveness. In Jesus' Name. AMEN.

necessities that nothing outside of Him can satisfy. "Lord Jesus," exclaimed Tennyson's gifted young friend, Arthur Hallam, "I have tried how this thing and that thing will fit my spirit. I can find nothing to rest on; for nothing here hath any rest itself. Oh, thou fulness of all things, I come back and join myself to Thee!"

No good works, no atoning tears, no protracted sorrow, no bodily mortifications, no painful pilgrimages, no costly offerings, no retirement into cell and cloister-life, are required. All needful sacrifice has been made. Christ made it all on Calvary. The Fountain filled with blood, is free to all. And hard by this Fountain perpetually stand the messengers of God, calling in trumpet tones to the sons of men, "Ho, every one that is a-thirst, come ye to the waters." And other voices also call: the voice of conscience and reason; the voices of both the law and Gospel, of Providence and grace, of death and judgment, and the sweet-toned bells of heaven; all unite in bidding welcome these waters of life.

But alas, how many have deaf ears to these voices bidding welcome to these waters of life! Now may the prophet's lament be heard, "who hath believed our report, and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?" "Why do ye spend money for that which is not bread, and your labor for that which satisfieth not?" Its acceptance must be by repentance and faith in the Son of God.

THIS figure of a fountain teaches us the moral beauty of salvation through Christ. Water is beautiful, but a fountain of water is surpassingly beautiful. All nature teems with objects of beauty. Earth and sky everywhere present them. The shady

The Beautiful Gate

SUNDAY. Matt. 6:28. "Consider the lilies." To any one who reads the New Testament story of the life and teaching of Jesus, it is abundantly evident how real and constant was the Master's communion with the Father through the outer world. Nature was a spiritual medium. But it was more than a transcript of a will. It was more than a mystic writing. It was more than a wonderfully vital symbolism. Nature, and everything in nature, was a gateway through which the Invisible became visible, and the Eternal manifested Himself in time. In nature He went forth to meet God, and God came forth to meet Him. Natural beauty was a highway, and, as in some royal procession, it was filled with the advancing glory of the Lord: "The whole earth was full of His glory."

It may be well just to pause and say that no one had ever thought and spoken about nature as Jesus did. Our scholars can find no other words to compare with His. Dr. Abbott says they "can not be paralleled either in Hebrew or pagan literature." And Dr. Bosanquet doubts "whether such disinterested apprehension of floral beauty can be found outside, or prior to, Christian intelligence." One is glad to see that crown among the "many crowns" worn by our Lord; but even this crown is brighter than Dr. Bosanquet suggests, for our Lord's delight in flowers was much more than a "disinterested apprehension of floral beauty." The beauty was the outer garment veiling a wonderful Presence. No words can describe the intimacy of the spiritual communion which Christ discovered in the flowers of the field. A lily was an apocalypse; God was manifest in matter. That was the wonder of it, the living thing was alive with God.

And so we are to "consider the lily," and every other lovely thing in nature's world. And we are to reverently stand before nature as though through its splendid roads a King were advancing toward us in royal pomp and glory. We are to assume an alert yet lowly receptiveness, if perchance the King may stop at our door, and may even enter under our roof.

Let me give two quotations, which show two very different men standing before nature in the blessed experience of spiritual communion. And the first shall be from a letter which Horace Bushnell wrote to his wife. He is writing from Lake Waramaug. "I have had some delightful times since I came here, such as I never had before. I never so saw God, never had Him so broadly, clearly out. . . . I never thought I could possess God so completely." Let me add to this sentence another from a letter written at Niagara: "Verily my soul reveled within me today, as never since I was a conscious being, in the contemplation of this tremendous type of God's eternity and majesty. I could scarcely stand, such was the sense it gave me of the greatness of God." And the second man I want to quote is Charles Kingsley, so very-unlike Bushnell in many things, and yet so alike in the firm and bracing strength of their spiritual communion. He is writing to a young fellow who has sought his counsel—"Study nature—not scientifically—that would take eternity to do it so as to reap moral good from it. Do not study nature for its own sake, but as the countenance of God. Try to extract every line of beauty, every association, every moral reflection, every inexpressible feeling from it—Adore God!"

It may be that some are more expert than others in the spiritual discernment of nature's great Secret, but it is a road which we may all travel; and the more we exercise ourselves the greater will be our gains, and very surely the joy of the Lord will be our strength!

The Baptism of the Spirit

MONDAY. Matt. 3:16. "The heavens were opened unto Him and He saw the spirit of God descending like a dove and lighting upon Him." If Christ felt the need of the baptism of the Holy Spirit at the beginning of His ministry, how can any minister, missionary, teacher or humble follower of the Master neglect His visit to Pentecost? If Jesus' last words to His disciples were, "Tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endued with power from on high," how can we refuse to obey His command? How few followers today tarry for the reception of purifying power, witnessing power, holy dynamite with which to help blow up the gates of hell, turning the world heavenward! If the apostolic church waited till the promise of Jesus was verified, if they then spake as the Spirit gave them wonderful utterance, spreading the truth of the Gospel throughout the world, is not the lack of this power in many churches in our day the reason why the revival spirit has departed? Is it not a sad fact that a few eccentric professors have frightened away multitudes in the Church from the reception of Pentecostal power? Instead of such fear and trembling lest we should become ridiculed as a peculiar people, why not follow great characters in history, such as John, Peter and Paul, Luther, Wesley and Knox, who obtained promises, powers and victories by obeying the command of Jesus to wait for the reception of power sent down from heaven.

It is said that Mr. Moody, one day during his first revival services in New York City, stopped at the home of a friend and asked for a room in which to be alone for awhile. The friend said "Won't you tarry for dinner with us?" "Oh, no," he replied, "I only wish to be alone for a time." When he came out from that closet room of prayer, his face shone with a new light and his great congregation that evening became awakened as never before. The baptism of spiritual power had come to him and recharged his soul, changing the whole current of his ministry. Would it not be well for all Christian denominations who admired Moody in life, who delight to remember his triumphant departure into the heavens, to follow his example as he followed Christ, seeking a baptism from heaven, with outstretched arms and upward gaze, as Jesus looked for the dove to descend upon Him?

The Bridge-Builders

TUESDAY. Rom. 13:6. "Render therefore to all their due." Recently several publications have reprinted a poem called "Building the Bridge for Him." The story is of an old man who had safely crossed a "chasm vast and deep and wide," but who had paused on the other side and "built a bridge to span the tide." A fellow pilgrim remonstrated with him for wasting his time, stating that his journey was done and he would never pass that way again, therefore the folly of building the bridge "at eventide."

"The builder lifted his old gray head.
'Good friend, in the path I have come,' he said,
'There followeth after me today
A youth whose feet must pass this way.
This chasm that has been naught to me,
To that fair-haired youth may a pitfall be;
He, too, must cross in the twilight dim,
Good friend, I am building this bridge for him.'"

This is an epitome of the Christian life—a parable of our expected ministry and service. The true Christian is a builder not only for his own age and safety, but for the safety of generations yet unborn. The idealists of the Church are not only brilliant talkers about the Kingdom but passionate workers at its establishment. With them, as with the Christ they follow, the vision and the task are one. Every good man and woman, every helpful toiler and constructive thinker, every Christian preacher and teacher, every missionary of God's grace and laborer in the vineyard of better things, is a bridge builder. The opportunity and the challenge comes to every one to be a bridge builder and to express life in the highest terms in the interest of the greatest good to the greatest number.

The Abundant Life

WEDNESDAY. John 10:10. "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly." It is violence to the spirit of the Christ to interpret Christianity as a set of inhibitions. It is a deplorable thing that we have so misinterpreted Him, that in the minds of so many Christianity consists in abstinence from certain things. The jailor at Philippi asked Paul a question which has become classical: "What must I do to be saved?" We are inclined today to change that question by a slight addition and ask, "What must I not do to be saved?"

A few Sundays ago, I listened with great interest to a group of earnest Christian young people discussing Sabbath observance. One after another expressed views on the subject, and in all the number not one struck the positive note. All were concerned with the particular things that should not be done on Sunday. It is such interpretations that have given ground for the sneering definition of religion as "a collection of scruples which impede the free exercise of our faculties." It is not the Christ, but our interpretation of Him, that make such definitions possible. The scrupulous keeping of no set of prohibitory laws will ever make a man a Christian. A man may not do ever so many things and still not be right in the sight of God.

Jesus Christ came that we might have life, and that we might have it more abundantly, or 'to the full,' as Moffatt translates. His mission is not to hamper life, but to cause life to grow and abound. Until we know that fulness of life which He alone gives, we know not what life means.

Paul was right when he told us that "Where the spirit of the Lord is, there is liberty." The highest liberty, the abundant life, lies in companionship with Him.

Parched Ground and the Pool

THURSDAY. Isa. 35:7. "And the parched ground shall become a pool." In one of the Western States there is a vast desert. There is little water there and what there is is so impregnated with alkali as to make it unfit for use. Travelers cross that desert on their way to mining camps. Not a few have died of thirst. Some years ago it occurred to a man to sink an artesian well in the midst of the desert and erect a wind pump, with a suitable reservoir to store fresh water for the use of travelers. It was an expensive undertaking, but many have blessed the memory of him who made a well in the desert.

The world into which Jesus came was not utterly devoid of love, but kindness was not the rule of most men's lives, and good-will was far from prevalent. At the beginning of the Christian era, there was only one hospital in the world, and that was founded for the purpose of taking care of wounded gladiators in order that they might again amuse the multitude.

Jesus Christ with His new commandment, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself"; with His benediction upon the lowly, the meek and the pure in heart; with His Golden Rule and His unfailing emphasis upon the spirit of unselfish service, opened a well in the desert. Every modern impulse to philanthropy and every holy passion for the improvement of society may be numbered among the conscious or unconscious effects of Christianity. The parched ground has become a pool.

The Endless Life

FRIDAY. John 11:26. "Whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die." Our life, by God's gracious gift, is immortal, untouched by death, years or the ages of eternity. Christ is our resurrection and life; in us the hope and joy of His glory. Death is but the transition of the cleansed and refurbished soul into the palace of His personal presence. Calvary is the summit where we celebrate the world's victory.

Do we not long for something besides endless years? Must we not have pardon, peace and Christ's likeness when in the heavenly places with Him?

Their brother Lazarus back from the grave, the sisters at Bethany knew that death has no power over the life of Christ's followers. The path of human glory may lead but to the grave, but in Jesus, the path to the grave, by the way of the Cross, leads to glory everlasting.

The Author and Builder of worlds could not be nailed upon the cross against His will, or imprisoned in a tomb. He laid down His life knowing He was able to take it again. Is not the angel of His presence leading His people up their Calvaries, down into the sepulchre gardens as the only route into His celestial heaven? By and by we will be caught up together with Him in the clouds of His eternal glory, and so be forever with our Lord. He Who transfigured death into life will bring you with Him to the Father's house, for where He is there we shall be also.

"All Things Possible"

SATURDAY. Mark 9:23. "If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth." This is a truism for those who are struggling in the secular as well as the religious world. There is no termination without determination. Neither is there any accomplishment without faith in God, and in work we are doing. As individuals we have not yet realized our possibilities. Collectively, as a Church we have not yet realized them. As Kingdom-builders none of us have gone the limit of our strength and endeavor. Professor James once wrote an essay entitled, "The Power of Man." In this he argued that mankind is living on a very small fraction of its vitality, and that there are buried underground strata of possibilities and power which are never tapped, except in times of great emergency. Robert E. Speer, commenting on the above, said: "This is an absolute truth of experience all through life. In our great crises any one of many forces may unlock these energies and let them loose. And the present needed appeal of the world is to men and women that they should not be content to draw upon these reservoirs in crises alone. The tragic crises come because these powers are not drawn forth and used. The great wealth of nations and of the world that needs now to be unsealed is just the wealth of moral capacity lying dormant within."

In other words, "the Kingdom of God is within you." Let us pray for the new and better day for the human race, as though everything depended on God and let us toil for the same end as though everything depended on us. "If thou canst believe, all things are possible."

Hidden Personalities

SHE was a girl that folk said I wouldn't like—a girl who was self-contained and poised and more than a bit stand-offish. She was successful—very—in a business way, and ever so sure of herself. And that made her seem even more difficult to get close to.

And yet, when I met her, I wanted to like her. And I wanted to know her well. And so one afternoon when it was all sunshiny and bright and happy out of doors we went for a walk together. And the sky was blue overhead, and the ground felt pleasant under our feet, and the late autumn air was crisp and very clear. And perhaps it was the sunshine and the blue sky, and perhaps it was because we were both young enough to feel the joy of living, but—at any rate—we got to talking and we spoke of large unpersonal things, and of little friendly things, and of decidedly intimate things. And—despite what people had said—I began to like the girl. And by the time we had reached the starting-back-place—which is at the middle of all good walks—I found that I was liking her very well indeed. And—as time goes on—I think that I am going to like her more and more!

Often, it has been proved quite conclusively to me that it's wrong to form an opinion based on someone else's observation or judgment. More than once I've found that, the only fair thing to do is to search out a reason for the whys and the wherefores of life. We can't just decide that folk are pleasant or unpleasant because other people say they are. In all honesty and truthfulness—to them and to ourselves—we've got to get below the surface and know, from our own reactions, what is right and what is wrong!

HAVE you ever gone into the woods in springtime to hunt for arbutus? If you haven't ever done it, you must plan to, sometime, for it's a real adventure! The flowers don't grow in great dewy pink clusters, right out in the open—no, indeed! It's a search that you have to make for them; it's a hunt and a following of vague promises.

Autumn's leaves—the leaves that fall listlessly at this time of year—lie, like a brown carpet, over the springtime woods. Sometimes there's a ruggedness to the carpet—a gaping tear in it. And sometimes, through the tear, a single shoot of green or a glimmer of faint rose color shines through. And when it does, you go up rather softly, and make the gaping tear larger. And then you're quite apt to find the flowers that you're searching for.

It takes quite a while to gather a really large bunch of arbutus. Arbutus isn't as easy to find as the summer flowers that grow openly—with vivid splashes of color—in verdant stretches of meadow land. Arbutus is, before everything else, a shy blossom. It must be sought out, appreciated, and cherished. The finding of it brings a very real glow of joy.

To some folk, perhaps, the woods where arbutus flowers grow would seem dull and colorless and uninteresting. They are, often, at first glance. To some folk the carpet of dead leaves would be a pall—and nothing else. But to some people the dead leaves would seem like a blanket to be turned back softly. To some people the very dullness would hold a certain allure, a certain splendid mystery.

Finding personalities is often like finding arbutus. It's a search, sometimes, and a promise. Sometimes it holds

They're as Pleasant to Find as Buried Treasure—or Spring Flowers

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

There are people who think that friendliness of the obvious sort is the only real kind of friendliness—that a stand-offish person should be left strictly alone. There are people who say:

"Let her be! If she doesn't want to meet us half-way, we can get along very well without her."

That is absolutely the wrong attitude to take—if you're at all interested in being good pals with everybody. For there are some people who won't take the first step in friendship any more than an arbutus flower can creep out, from under its blanket of last autumn's leaves, to meet you.

Most people, who seem cold and indifferent and a bit too shut within themselves, aren't all the romance of buried treasure. Sometimes it's like reading the thrilliest story in the world. Sometimes it's like listening to the sweetest song!

They're usually only shy—quite tremendously shy. And they are held firmly in their places—as sturdy roots hold arbutus flowers—by almost unbreakable bonds of reticence. . . .

SHE was a girl that folk said I wouldn't like. She was a girl who seemed as frigidly apart from me as a small iceberg. And yet it didn't take much—only a walk in the sparkling autumn air, and a little informal conversation—to give us a real start on the road to comradeship.

If I had—and it would have been very easy!—agreed with other people; if I had accepted, in an unquestioning way, the popular consensus, we might never have had our walk and our all revealing conversation. We might have gone on separate ways—forever—without the gleam of friendliness between us. But I didn't want to go by the verdict that other people had given—I wanted really to know for myself. And I did!

It's interesting to pause and wonder, sometimes, what would have happened if some of the great ones of history had been content with the things that were easy to get—that were out in the open. What if Christopher Columbus had been utterly uninterested in a hidden world? And what if Fulton had been bored with the thought of harnessing steam to propel ships? What if Benjamin Franklin had been afraid of the lightning that gave him an inspiration that developed into the finding and utilizing of electricity? What—to bring the idea into our own generation—of the sufferers who would have gone unaided if Madam Curie had been content to let the initial grain of radium stay buried in a great pile of dirt? These are only a very few instances—out of many!

Of course it sounds silly to compare tremendous achievements to the little incidents of our daily life. Steam and new continents and electricity shouldn't be mentioned in the same paragraph—perhaps—with arbutus and personalities. And yet the principles involved are built, in an almost startling manner, upon the same truth.

Friends of mine, don't pass by the hidden things of life—whether they are flowers, or personalities, or—anything. Make your own decisions, follow your own lines of thought. Because, if you do, you'll find that sometimes the greatest pleasure in the world is the keen joy of discovery. You'll find that a hidden flower is more delicate, often, the one that grows beside a much-used pathway. And you'll find that a hidden personality that has lived quite unsuspected in a shy heart is often undeniably dear and worth the finding.

FLOWERS are hidden away, sometimes,
Where only a searcher may find them;
Hearts are hidden away, sometimes,
When there's never a cord to bind them.
To other hearts—so they pine and droop,
In a lonely, forgotten way—
And the glow of them fades, as blossoms fade,
That were lovely, yesterday.

Flowers are hidden beneath brown leaves,
But the leaves may be brushed aside;
And hearts are hidden as far away,
Under hopes and dreams that have died . . .
But the flowers and hearts are found, sometimes,
And the flowers gleam with delight;
And the hearts shine out—like wee, happy stars—
That smile through the dark of night!

New Invention Revolutionizes The Art of Cooking

I am now able to offer to the world the cheapest, easiest and most perfect method of preparing the family meals ever known. Here is a cooking appliance that saves 50% to 75% of fuel cost—saves hours of time—saves countless steps—and insures better prepared, more tasty and healthful meals, from cereals to dessert.

Automatic Rapid Electric Cook Stove

A new, simple, practical invention that gives you every cooking, baking, roasting, frying, boiling and toasting facility of the expensive electric range, plus every advantage of the fireless cooker, at less than you would pay for even a good gasoline or oil cookstove, and at less fuel expense than any other known method of cooking. No other cooking stove or appliance needed. Simply snap on the switch and electricity heats the food. When the cooking starts, it shuts itself off automatically and the "fireless cooker" principle does the rest, without any additional heat or attention from you. Attaches to any electric light socket, requires no special wiring. Ready for use when you receive it. Aluminum lined throughout. Equipped with "Wear-Ever" cooking utensils. Guaranteed.

Try It Thirty Days At My Risk

I want you to try this great invention 30 days in your own kitchen—at my risk. I want to prove what it will do for you. Get complete information, all the facts about this great invention.

Paul's Experiences at Jerusalem

International Sunday School Lesson for November 6

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

ELECTION DAY is only a few days off, when men and women will show where they stand in matters, both moral and political, by the little white, secret ballot. At Jerusalem, Paul indicated clearly where he stood in affairs that were national, moral and religious. At Caesarea, Paul had boldly declared that he was ready to die at Jerusalem for the name of the Lord Jesus, and it seemed a number of times as if the death of the great apostle to the gentiles would take place, yet at no time did he deviate in the slightest degree from his open allegiance to Jesus Christ.

Startling events followed each other with great rapidity after Paul reached Jerusalem. The entire passage indicated for our lesson study should be read a number of times, even though the general facts are quite familiar. James, the brother of Jesus, must have rejoiced to learn how his half-brother was being recognized even as far away as Europe. The Jerusalem elders and doubtless many other church leaders and workers were present when the graphic story of that third missionary journey was recounted. Many thrilling incidents must have been related which are not recorded by Luke, the historian. Then there was much joy as the offering was counted which had been gathered from many communities by Paul and his co-workers.

Unkind statements had been made about Paul, and the Jerusalem friends thought that Paul could refute them by showing some special zeal as a Jew. Paul was advised to complete the vow which was begun at Cenchrea (18:18) and at the same time pay the cost of the vows of four others who were then in Jerusalem and who desired to keep a Jewish custom. The question of a Hebrew breaking entirely with his national religious festivals when he becomes a Christian is still an interesting one. Paul did as he was urged. Most people regard his act as a compromise in non-essentials, that he might gain attention with many for the message concerning his Redeemer.

As is still often the case, the attempt to please did not succeed. Jews from Asia who did not understand the situation, or who deliberately used the occasion to injure Paul, stirred up the great crowd which had come to Jerusalem for the Feast of Weeks, or Pentecost. Fanaticism often asserts itself when real religion ceases to have a helpful, controlling influence. The charge was that the temple was being defiled by this would-be teacher who had deliberately brought gentiles within the restricted area of the temple courts. The mob-infection reached quickly to many parts of the city and, to say the least, unholy methods were resorted to in the name of religion.

PUPILS of all ages will be interested in a careful study of the temple area and the temple itself with all the related courts. There was a pronouncement of death to any gentile who passed from the Court of the Gentiles through the Gate Beautiful, which led to the Court of the Women. Even a Roman citizen gentile must not presume on his citizenship for protection if he passed beyond that clearly placed warning tablet. It is interesting to note that today a Jew is barred from the Mosque of Omar, built on the site of the Temple of Herod. In connection with this experience in Paul's life, find out all you can concerning the Nazarite (note the spelling) vow which is mentioned in Numbers 6:1-21.

When the shouting, angry Jewish mob became so powerful and violent that the life of Paul was endangered, word was brought to Claudius Lysias, the chief captain and military tribune, whose headquarters were in the Castle Antonia, which had a staircase leading into the Court of the Gentiles. Two chains held Paul fast as he was surrounded by the Roman guard to protect him from the aroused, unintelligible crowd. When Claudius inquired who the prisoner was and what he had done, no clear information was obtained, so the Romans headed for Antonia.

Though the people shouted "Away with him," Paul saw the opportunity of delivering a message for his Master, and asked permission to speak, which was granted by the chief captain. The story of his conversion was then placed before the people who were banded upon and in front of the stairs. The people seemed to listen until Paul mentioned his mission to the gentiles, whereupon the rabble renewed their outcries.

No romance can surpass the thrills of the incidents in the Scripture covered by this lesson. There is an abundance of excitement in the Bible narratives. Paul is now, by special order of Claudius Lysias, tied up with thongs for scourging, in the hope that by use of the "third degree," some confession may be extracted from the prisoner. At Philippi Paul submitted to a beating, though he might have saved himself by declaring his Roman citizenship, as he now does in a most startling manner. The centurion in charge first caught the fact and forthwith the stopped proceedings, and himself went to the chief captain with the remonstrance, "What art thou about to do?" Claudius appreciated the gravity of the situation and immediately sought the bound man for one of the most interesting dialogues in the Bible.

READ again, picturing the whole situation, the conversation of these two Roman citizens. The terrified chief captain stopped the proposed cruelty, and he would find a more peaceful way on the morrow to learn the facts from the accusing Jews. Little progress was made even then, for when Paul felt the temper of his audience and saw that all are against him, the situation was saved only by starting a quarrel between the Sadducees and the Pharisees over the mention of the resurrection, which the former sect denied. Now the chief captain was over-concerned for the safety of Paul, and he brought this noted prisoner into the Castle again.

In time of action one can be bold, even when a decision is being made in which right and wrong are involved. The situation is quite different when sitting alone, a prisoner and knowing that all the witnesses are against you. Paul may have seriously questioned, in view of the outcome, if he was right in coming to Jerusalem in face of the entreaty and advice of loving friends at Miletus, Tyre and Caesarea. It was at midnight in Paul's life that the Lord came to him with another of those blessed night-messages and said: "Be of good cheer: for as thou hast testified concerning me at Jerusalem, so must thou bear witness also at Rome." We are told that "weeping may endure for a night but joy cometh in the morning." This time Paul's intense joy came while it was still night. The Lord's declaration is so wonderful—that it brings cheer now, with approval of the Jerusalem trip and Rome assured.

Note also just when this vision came: it was at the beginning of many months of imprisonment; but all the time that Paul would be in Northern Palestine, he could just think back to that night in Jerusalem and say "Rome." He knew that God kept every promise, some time somehow. In our lesson study for October 2, "Paul in Corinth," references were given of other occasions when Paul had glorious visions and messages of approval from his loving Saviour. God always has his own way of bringing needed help. This time it was through Paul's nephew and the now friendly Claudias. That fascinating story is the special theme for the primaries and juniors. Lean hard on the Golden Text: "God is our refuge and strength. A very present help in trouble. Therefore will we not fear."

The George Williams Centenary

HOW marvelous is the power of an idea energized in a human personality. A striking illustration is found in the career of George Williams, founder of the Young Men's Christian Association, the centenary of whose birth—October 11—has been appropriately celebrated in England and America, and indeed wherever the Association is found—and where is it not?

How a Draper's Clerk Founded a World-Wide Organization

By REV. HOWARD B. GROSE, D.D.

George Williams worked incessantly for the Association, despite the heavy demands of his large and expanding business. He went to London without influence or capital and amassed a fortune, but he was never so wealthy that his generosity cost him little or nothing. His donations to all sorts of religious work were on a lavish scale. He spared himself that he might spend on others, living in the most quiet and simple fashion.

Before his death he saw a marvelous development of the institution. The jubilee of the founding, held in London in 1894, was an overwhelming testimony to the place George Williams held in popular esteem and in the affection of the Association membership the world over. Queen Victoria conferred on him the honor of knighthood and he was given the freedom of the City of London, while deputations and messages from all parts of the world greeted him.

WHEN the Jubilee of the Association's start in North America was celebrated in 1901, Sir George came to this country and was everywhere accorded an ovation. And when in 1905 he attended the jubilee of the World's Conference of the Y. M. C. A. in Paris, he was received with a demonstration of personal feeling and affection rarely witnessed. That same year, in November, he died, and was buried in St. Paul's Cathedral, among the great of England, and not far from that little upper room where the Y. M. C. A. was born. The last message he sent to the young men of America was this: "Watch the adversary, love one another, keep true, fight on, win the battle." At the ripe age of eighty-three he passed to his heavenly reward.

When the founder died in 1905, sixty-one years after its beginning, there were 7,773 Associations, with 722,000 members. Today the totals have grown to more than 9,000 Associations, with over 1,500,000 members. Beginning in England in 1844, the Association movement came to Canada and the United States in 1851, the first Associations formed being in Montreal and Boston. Then it spread to the Continent of Europe, to New Zealand, Australia, and later to the Orient. It has girdled the earth with religious centers for young men, and exercised an inestimable influence for good. Well may the memory of Sir George Williams be held in high esteem.

The growth of the Association in the United States has been phenomenal, the latest figures, including Canada, giving a membership of 935,581 in the 2,195 Associations, and property worth $123,548,900, with 4,608 employed officers. Gains were made during the last year in every line of activity, and Dr. John R. Mott, General Secretary of the International Committee, in summing up the work, says that "in almost every class of the Associations it has been a year of progress."

The war work of the Y. M. C. A., which made it an international factor recognized by all the Allies for invaluable service rendered, is fairly familiar to our people, but the extent of its sphere of service is not so well known. It will surprise many to learn that in addition to their great work at home, the North American Associations are carrying on work in more than twenty countries, while Y. M. C. A. activities under other national auspices bring the number of countries with established Associations up to nearly twice that number. In addition the work among Allied armies and ex-service men still continues in Europe and the Near East and American funds are still financing a work on behalf of more than 2,000,000 such men.

Looking back to that meeting of the twelve, called together by the draper's clerk, and then trying to realize the size and significance of the Association movement in many lands today, we can only say, "What hath God wrought!" And what can not He do still through consecrated and obedient and Christ loyal personality?

There were hundreds and thousands of linen draper's clerks in England at the time, but to only one of them came the idea of winning his comrades to Christ and Christian service through the personal touch. And out of this idea developed the work that has girdled the globe, and made the letters Y. M. C. A. stand for human helpfulness and divine blessing on land and sea.

The story of beginnings is full of fascination. A farmer's son in Somersetshire, England, youngest of eight sons, born into a family representing generations of yeomen farmers, his tastes were not for farm life, and on leaving school at thirteen he drifted around for a couple of years, when his father apprenticed him to a draper at Bridgewater. A "careless, thoughtless, godless, swearing fellow" he says he then was. But presently he fell under the influence of a godly minister, Rev. Evan James of the local Congregational Chapel, a young man's man, and was led to give his heart to Christ. That was a great day for minister and chapel and convert, even for England and the world, but only God knew how great. Young Williams not only made the decision to alter his life, but adopted as his motto, "To live not unto himself but to the glory of God and the service of men." In 1838 he united with the church at Bridgewater, and completing his apprenticeship that same year, at nineteen found himself in the employment of Hitchcock and Rogers, a drapers' firm on Ludgate Hill, in St. Paul's Churchyard, London, with £40 a year salary. So far as business is concerned, it may be said at once that he eventually became chief partner of Hitchcock, Williams & Co., and expanded the business until it held a foremost position in the trade.

BUT the young man's interest could not be bounded by trade. In London his first concern was to single out one after another of the young men in the drapery establishment and seek to win them to a life of Christian service. He was a personal evangelist after the pattern in the first chapter of John's Gospel. He established regular prayer-meetings in his small bedroom on the third floor of the building, and these meetings were central in his program, and became the foundations on which the Y. M. C. A. was built. By 1848 Williams and two or three young men who had stood with him from the start found themselves the leaders of a movement that had affected the whole mercantile establishment, from the head of the firm down to the youngest apprentice on the staff of 140.

The simple organization they had formed among the clerks at Hitchcock and Rogers was known as the Young Men's Society. One day, while crossing Blackfriars Bridge, Williams expressed to a friend, Edward Beaumont, his desire that the Society might be extended to every drapery establishment in London. "All right, you lead and I'll follow," said Beaumont. This led to a call for a meeting on June 6, 1844, at which twelve young men were present. Three were Episcopalians, three Congregationalists, three Baptists, and three Methodists. It was agreed to form an organization "to influence religious young men to spread the Redeemer's Kingdom amongst those by whom they were surrounded." And this was the birth of the Young Men's Christian Association, though that name was not chosen until two months later. The group of twelve has now become the army of more than a million and a half.

From the organization's birth until his death, sixty years later in 1905,

"I Know I Can Make Good, If Only My Nerves Hold Out."

HE had been a successful business man. He had never lost a day from business because of illness. Then came the Great War. His son was wounded. This blow together with the worry over great money losses, by reason of the war, caused a complete nervous breakdown and physical collapse. Because of his natural strength his Nerve Force slowly returned to what it had been. At last he was ready to recoup his losses by exploiting a great new idea. Then the great question presented itself—"Would his Nerves stand the strain?"

Millions of people less vigorous than this man need to ask themselves—"Will my Nerves stand the strain to attain the goal of my life?" In many cases the answer must be NO!!

The truth is that Nerve Exhaustion is almost a universal malady.

What Readers Say:—

"I have gained 12 pounds since reading your book, and I feel so energetic."

"Your book did more for me for digestion than two courses in dieting."

"Your book has helped my nerves wonderfully. I am sleeping so well and in the morning I feel so rested."

"The advice given in your book on relaxation and calming of nerves has cleared my brain. Before I was half dizzy all the time."

A prominent lawyer in Ansonia, Conn., says, "Your book saved me from a nervous collapse, such as I had three years ago. I now sleep soundly and am gaining weight. I can again do a real day's work."

Most people are but half-awake, half-alive and half-efficient solely because they lack NERVE FORCE. Nine-tenths of all human ailments are due to abused and weakened nerves. Every physician knows this.

Read NERVE FORCE, a 64-page book written by Paul von Boeckmann, who for more than 20 years has been an authority on Nerve Culture. The price of the book is only 25 cents, (coin or stamps).

NOTE:—Within the last 20 years more than a million of the author's various books on Health and Efficiency have been sold throughout the world. The book NERVE FORCE is his greatest success. If you do not agree that it marks the turning point in your life for better health, greater efficiency and more happiness, your money will be refunded with your outlay for postage. Send for the book TODAY.

WESSON OIL leaves absolutely no flavor in the food fried in it, save that of dainty crispness. Moreover, it may be used again and again to the very last ounce. It does not matter whether you chance to fry onions at dinner for Tuesday and wish to use the same Wesson Oil for doughnuts on Wednesday. The "taste" of onions will not be transmitted.

After each frying the Wesson Oil should be drained through a fine sieve into a clean can.

Occasionally, it should be put on to heat with some sliced, raw potato to clarify it.

The fat will apparently "boil." When it has become still, and the potato is brown, it may be poured through cheesecloth into a clean receptacle. The potato has the property of attracting to itself the foreign products which have been introduced into the fat by many "fryings."

Nation's Capital

The little matter of 15c will bring you the Pathfinder thirteen weeks on trial. The Pathfinder is a cheerful illustrated weekly, published at the Nation's center, for people everywhere; an independent home paper that tells the story of the world's news in an interesting, understandable way. Now in its 29th year. This splendid National weekly supplies a long-felt want: it costs but $1 a year. If you want to know what is going on in the world, this is your means. If you want a paper in your home which is reliable and wholesome; if you would appreciate a paper which puts everything clearly, strongly, briefly, entertainingly—here it is. Splendid serial and short stories and miscellany. The Question Box answers YOUR questions and is a mine of information. Send 15c to show that you might like such a paper, and we will send the Pathfinder on probation 13 weeks. The 15c does not repay us, but we are glad to invest in new friends. The Pathfinder, 216 Lamedon St., Washington, D.C.

The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

A LARGE number of letters was laid before the latest meeting of the Prayer League. They embraced a wide variety of subjects, including many acknowledgments of answered prayer, and all were presented in prayer. We give the following extracts:

"I sent you a special delivery letter early in April," writes Mrs. I. A., Ga., "requesting prayer for my mother's restoration to health. Recently I wired you a request for my sister. I write now to advise that both prayers were answered speedily, and I wish to thank all the members for their intercession. Though I am so very grateful, I feel that words are inadequate to express my heartfelt appreciation of God's goodness."

Aged Minister, Canada, writes: "God has answered my prayers so often and in so many and wonderful ways that my heart overflows with gratitude. I know by happy experience God does answer prayer." The pastor adds: "And will you please pray that God will give me a richer baptism of the Spirit and also visit all my family with a rich baptism of the Holy Ghost."

Mrs. J. R., N. H., writes: "I wrote you before that God (praise His name) was blessedly answering prayer. He is continuing His wonderful work. When I look in my husband's face and see the brightness of his eyes and the increased flesh and improved color, I thank God who has done it. My sister is blessed in mind, soul and body, but He seems to have done more for me than for them."

Miss O. W., Va., writes: "Last spring I wrote you requesting the League to pray for the conversion of thirty-three pupils of mine. Since that time twenty-six have made a profession. Please continue to pray for the others."

Mrs. O. M. writes: "I asked prayers for my daughter that she might be cured of a cough; our prayers have been answered, I am thankful to say."

Miss N. E. J., Moore, S. C., writes: "I wish to thank God for helping me in trouble. I feel grateful to Him. We should never doubt His promises."

Mrs. S., Texas, acknowledges answered prayer on behalf of her husband, "who has returned home and through the Gospel message has heard the call to preach. Please pray that he may continue faithful. Also pray for the minister who brought the message to him."

Mrs. J. W. K., Ia., writes: "I wish to acknowledge so many wonderful answers to prayers for which I do sincerely thank God."

Mrs. M. J. C., Oregon, writes to acknowledge a wonderful answer to prayer for "the perfect mental healing of two cousins and for the restored health of a son's wife." She also desires prayer for a friend who has not been able to walk for fourteen years.

We have also acknowledgments of answered prayers from J. B., Indiana, P. McC., Mrs. A. M., E. C., M. L. G. and Mrs. E. C. B.

We have received requests from members that prayers may be offered for an old-time revival in the following towns: Danville, Ky.; La Grange, Ind.; Knightdale, N. C.; Weyer's Cave, Va.; Noble's Chapel, Ind.; Pine Bluff, N. C.; Chattanooga, Tenn.; Donnellson, Ill.; Dodgeville, Wis.; Gallupville, N. Y.; Erie, Kansas; Paris, Tenn.

The following general requests have been received from members: healing of self and others, 114; financial aid, 25; conversion of relatives and friends, 125; guidance, 23; spiritual advancement, 32; faith, 19; success, 11; prosperity, 15; peace, 10; reunion of loved ones, 7; heart's desire, 29; vision, 2; forgiveness, 5; that loved ones may be cured of the drink habit, 7; wisdom, 9; happiness, 5; friendships restored, 3.

Young People's Topics for Nov. 6

Thy Will Be Done—With My Money

E. L. and B. Y. P. U. Matt. 6:7-15

"YOUR money or your life" is the demand of a selfish world. Fox's "Book of Martyrs" is nothing like the chronicle of the martyrs of Mammon. The trouble these days is that men and women are not living sacrificial lives, but that they are making sacrifices on the altars of wrong things. Losing one's life for the empty baubles and glittering jewels of paste which the world offers means in the last analysis that everything is going out and nothing coming in. "Your money and your life" is the demand of an unselfish Kingdom, the generous heart of God and an efficient Church. In the energetics of the Kingdom the demand is that we dedicate ourselves, all we are and all we have, which includes our pocket-books.

The request is not "Your's or You," but "You and Your's." We hold the key to the storehouse and if this is a sacred trust we must open the door when the poor and needy seek and knock before the portal of our bounty. Tithing is being stressed more and more these days. It is the new note that is being sounded on an old truth. We are the trustees of life, the stewards of possessions, the custodians of the bounties. Tithing means that a man pays ten cents into the treasury of God out of every dollar God permits him to earn and keeps ninety cents for himself. That is one way to look at the matter. Here is another view of the subject: God gives a man nine dollars for every dollar a man gives to God.

The measure of our life is not what we give but what we have left after we have cast our lot into the treasury. The individual who has nothing to give is poor, but he who has to give and refuses to bestow is poor indeed. The first may still be in grace, but the second is certainly in disgrace. Modern men and women do not need to be told how to make or spend money, but how to spend and share their interest if not their principle. Money is the acid test of Christian life and living. Tithing is Scriptural and obligatory. Giving is an evidence of sincerity and sympathy expressed in practical and efficient terms.

Thy Will Be Done—With My Time

C. E. Matt. 6:7-15

TIME, like every good thing, is a gift from God. Together with the theme "The Christian Use of Money" let us consider "The Christian Use of Time." "Time is money," says the old proverb. True. Time is worth more than money. Time is the opportunity we have for living not only for our daily bread, our pleasures and other personal matters, but for the living of helpfulness and service to others. The author spends his time producing a book. Unless it is a good book the author wastes his time. The artist spends his time painting a picture. Unless it is a good picture he wastes his time.

There is plenty of time for personal culture, ministry to others, attending the means of grace and working in the kingdom, but there is no time to lose. We are only sure of the present, the hours called today, the time that is at hand. Tomorrow may not dawn. Then let us make the most of today. Eternity consists of the stuff on which we have spent our time. We prepare in time for eternity. "Count that day lost whose low descending sun has witnessed by thee no worthy action done."

Free Circulars for Investors

A number of interesting and valuable investment circulars have been published recently by the leading banks and investment houses which are in a position to serve Christian Herald readers.

As a convenience to you, we have arranged to furnish any of these circulars free to our readers. Simply check this list and write your name and address, on the margin, or write us asking for them by number. Address Financial Department. The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bond Opportunities—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.

Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2, describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.

Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or the remainder accrues from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 3.

To Invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent., and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co., 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent. are described in Circular 28.

Deere & Co., 10 year gold notes to yield 8.40%. Business farm investments. Founded by John Deere in 1837. Ask for Circular No. 51.

Circular No. 50 gives complete information on Federal Farm Loan Bonds. They pay 5% and are tax exempt.

Farm Mortgages—details also circulars regarding 6 per cent. First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Send for Circular 38.

Foreign Bonds—opportunities for obtaining Foreign Municipal Bonds with yearly drawings at par giving high average yield of 12 1/4 per cent.—Danish Internal Loans, Norwegian and Scandinavian Bonds. Booklet 48.

Bonds—questions answered, terms defined. A very valuable non-technical booklet that every prospective bond buyer should have. No. 42.

Selecting Your Investments, Strong Box Investments, Creating Good Investments, are three booklets describing the service and safe, high yield investments of a nationally known investment house. No. 43.

Questions and Answers

J. S. Minersville, Calif. The Christian Herald holds that the coming Washington Conference, in order to be absolutely on safe and sincere ground, should not only acknowledge the divine sovereignty at the outset by earnest prayer that its work may be guided by the will of God, but that the churches should use all their influence to make this clear, and that it should be the burden of their prayers also. That President Harding, as a Christian statesman, takes this view, we can not doubt. In several of his addresses, his personal reliance upon God as guide in his high office has been clearly expressed. Further, it is now planned to have a day of special prayer in the churches with the Conference and its mission in view.

Mrs. D. F. Boulder, Colo., writes: "I read with pleasure the article in the September 3 issue, 'A Declaration of Peace.' We are pleased that you are endeavoring to get the subject of prayer before the praying people of our nation. Your plan will certainly reach many, very many of the churches, but along with your efforts in that direction, if President Harding would issue an official call to prayer, more people would know and heed the call, so I thought that if you would call the attention of the President to the fact of his influence, and the good it would do to proclaim an official call to prayer, that he might do so. I remember when President Lincoln proclaimed a day of fasting and prayer during the days of the war of the Rebellion. Many people believed that it was a great force in deciding the overthrow of slavery. Greater issues are at stake in the discussion of world-wide disarmament."

J. R. L., Glen Sandfield, Ont., writes: "I am in full sympathy with your suggestion to the churches to pray for the accomplishment of disarmament. I wish to suggest that the churches in the United States and in Britain petition the proper authorities in the case, to have the sessions of the Conference opened with prayer. A prayerless conference is not likely to accomplish much. Britain and the United States claim to be Christian nations. Let them prove it in this conference by honoring Christ, by seeking His guidance, and by having each session opened with prayer in the name of Christ."

M. J. K., DeRidder, La., writes: "The Southern Baptist Convention, which met at Atlanta, Ga., in May, 1919, launched a campaign for $75,000,000. Actual subscriptions on this were not begun until December, and in three months' time reached the amount of $92,630,923. These subscriptions cover a period of five years. At a meeting of the Conservation Commission at Chattanooga, Tenn., in May last, the Commission was able to report total cash collections since the campaign began of $25,357,499.46. These funds are intended to care for all work fostered by the denomination, except home expenses of the churches. Southern Baptists in the past twenty years have made a remarkable advance. In 1901 there was a membership of 1,657,996; in 1921 there was a membership of 3,199,005. The value of church property in 1901 was $20,025,344 and in 1921, $97,732,990."

J. M., Olean, N. Y., Jesus promised His followers that whatsoever they asked, in faith, in His name, and in accordance with the Divine will, it would be granted. (See Matt. 21: 22; Luke 11: 10; John 14: 13, 14 and 15: 7; James 1: 6 and 4: 3; 1 John 3: 22 and other passages.) He is the same yesterday, today and forever. It is man's faith that is lacking. Yet we hear of cases even today, in which faith has realized the promise.

Very beautiful is this tribute which H. D. of Nevada, Mo., pays to her Bible Class teacher: "My Bible Class teacher, Mrs. D. Graves, belongs to the first Baptist Church of Nevada, Mo. She has taught Sunday school for thirty years. One class of hers had 14 young ladies in the class, all of whom at different times confessed Christ and became members of the Church. She said she carried them all in her heart and in her prayers. She has read the Bible through thirty-three times accomplishing this by reading three chapters each day and five on Sunday. She seldom misses services or weekly prayer meeting, and always takes an active part in Christian work and its various organizations. She has brought up a family of six children, all of whom are now good and useful citizens. She is seventy-five years old, but still does her own work and finds time to visit the sick."

Evangelist Ray Palmer writes us: "I have recently closed an eight months' campaign in California, having been invited there by the State Board. Many souls were saved. I am planning a campaign for the central and southern states." Evangelist Palmer may be addressed at 701 Tillamook St., Portland, Oregon.

Eva L., Yorkton, Sask., writes: "What do you think of Open Air meetings as conducted by the Salvation Army? Also in what way is a Christian taking such a stand looked upon by Christian churches in America today?"

Jesus taught the multitudes in the open, and we are told by the New Testament record that "the common people heard Him gladly." He urged His followers to seek out even those in the highways and byways. If the Divine Founder of Christianity was an open-air evangelist, and also His forerunner, John the Baptist, surely we need seek no further endorsement of that method of spreading the Gospel. As for the Salvation Army it has done a great work, and it can not be injured in the least by the criticism of people who are wedded to formalism. The writer of these lines knew General Booth and his family circle personally, and their splendid spiritual enthusiasm was not to be confined to church walls, but they had to proclaim the message to the entire world outdoors. We recall the first little contingent of Salvationists who came to America, and how difficult it was for them to obtain a hearing, or even to hold any meetings, until a way was opened with the assistance of the then editor of this paper, who "passed over" long ago. Since that time, we have come repeatedly into contact with the Salvation Army, and have no hesitation in saying that its leaders, its methods and its zeal, which surmounts all obstacles for the work's sake, has challenged our admiration and respect. Like Paul, it has been willing to be all things to all men, if by any means it might save some. The work has been a blessing to multitudes who, under existing social and religious conditions, could not be reached by the churches.

E. B. J., Rahway, N. J., writes: "Where can I find the text, in the Bible, which states that 'we are counted worthy to be co-laborers with Him'?"

The passage you have in mind is doubtless I Cor. 3: 9 "For we are laborers together with God." See also II Cor. 6: 1 and Acts 15: 4, in both of which the idea of Divine co-partnership is expressed.

M. D. S., Cohoes, N. Y., According to the reports of the Internal Revenue Bureau, Washington, D. C., the "luxury bill" of the United States for the year ending June 30, totaled, as estimated, $5,780,000,000 as against $6,450,000,000 in the preceding twelve months. The biggest items were as follows: tobacco, movies and other amusements, candies, motors, furs, cosmetics, musical instruments, sporting goods, certain kinds of wearing apparel, fine carpets and furniture, chewing gum, jewelry, fire-arms and ammunition. In almost all of these classes of goods, purchases were considerably below those of the preceding year.

Sara J., Dayton, O., writes: "One can not but be surprised at the list of natural disasters, storms, earthquakes, tidal waves, floods and the like over the last twelve months. How little these happenings, startling and even appalling as they would have seemed in former days, impress us now! Have we in recent years been so hardened by horrors, so calloused by calamities of man's making, that we can no longer thrill at Nature's sudden outbreaks? Has our civilization so degenerated that we no more sympathize with suffering? If war, with its tremendous waste of life and its wide infliction of suffering everywhere, has blunted human feeling, is it not climbing proof that a world of continually warring nations, however high their civilization might once have been, would soon relapse and become a world of savages?"

HEART STORIES

A New Book of Seven Stories

By Dr. Charles M. Sheldon
author of "IN HIS STEPS"

Dr. Sandison says:

"Dr. Sheldon's new book, entitled, 'Heart Stories,' shows his wonderful versatility in depicting the spiritual life in its most interesting phases. In these seven stories, the reader will find some of the most interesting themes.

We form the acquaintance of such characters as Andrew Stoddard, in the "Good Fight," who became a benefactor to his fellowmen after his own career had apparently been wrecked by an accident; Robert Arnold in "As Heaven Views It," whose routine, selfish nature was illumined by a vision in which he listened to the Recording Angel's record of one day of his own life; the sudden change of mind that caused the Pastor of the Church of Milton to withdraw his letter of resignation, and how it all came about is delightfully told in "Why the Minister Remained"; the story of Rosy Calvaire, the little factory box-maker, is stirringly told in "Of Such Is the Kingdom" and is a terrible arraignment of child labor; "Sunrise on the Mesa" is a story of the Arizona desert and the Navajo and Hopi Indians; "His Christmas Gift" is a Christmas story of New York life and experience, and what happened at the most remarkable Christmas dinner Sidney Allen had ever attended; the whole concluding with a coal mine story entitled "Guests of Honor," in which a winter storm brought unexpected guests to the mine manager's family circle, who treated them as guests of honor—but the stories the reader must read for himself. The whole, delightfully and romantically told, is well adapted to reading in the family group when its members meet by the cozy fire on winter evenings. All admirers of Dr. Sheldon's world-famous book, "In His Steps," should read this new book.

than any other city upon the habitable globe.

"If you are so blinded by your infatuation for your divinity as to doubt my statement with regard to her, ask whether she did or did not indite a letter three or four days after your departure for Chicago to the aforesaid reverend lady-killer, addressing him as her best friend and apprising him of the change of your itinerary, which would grant her—and him—a longer holiday in which to enjoy each other's society. Ask also, what use they have made of the 'respite'—that was the word she employed in this connection. Likewise how many letters have passed between the twain since that date. The reverend swain may neglect other 'soul-sick sisters,' as your facetious deacon calls them. He answers this one by return post, and it is rumored preserves the replies in lavender. I do not vouch for the truth of this last rumor. All that I have said beside is gospel truth.

"ANONYMA."

STUART HAILE was in the act of putting a book upon the library shelf and the hall clock had just struck three that afternoon, when a peal of the door-bell and a man's voice in the hall announced a visitor. Haile pushed the book well into place before turning to greet the caller.

"Mr. King! this is indeed a pleasant surprise!" he cried, cordially advancing with outstretched hand.

Instead of taking it, Rupert stood still in the middle of the room and held up an envelope with a threatening gesture.

"I received this this morning," he said hoarsely. "I ought to have brought it to you at once. I waited to weigh the evidence—I would not say the story before confronting you with it. I condemn no man unheard!"

"Evidence! Condemn!"—repeated Haile in abject bewilderment. "I do not comprehend in the least what you are driving at."

King tore open the envelope savagely. "Come here and see for yourself what I am driving at. I won't trust the thing out of my hands. I shall want it again."

While the other stared, more and more puzzled by his action and language, King sat down at the library table and spread out a sheet of paper creased as by rough handling, and smoothed it angrily.

"Now—read it over my shoulder. It is typed, you see. You will have no difficulty in doing it."

In saying it he struck the paper passionately and swore again under his breath. Haile leaned over the heaving shoulders and read silently and deliberately to the bottom of the page, scrutinized the signature, then as silently went through the hateful task a second time. He stepped back and faced King, who had arisen, putting the envelope back into his breast pocket, buttoning the coat as if he feared an attempt might be made to rob him of it. The action was so significant that Haile could have smiled had his mood been more temperate.

"That letter is a tissue of lies. Let us sit down and talk this over like sensible men. I do not wonder that it grated upon your nerves and temper."

"You mean to say, then," interrupted King, "that my—wife—Mrs. King—did not address you as her best friend?"

"She did! And if she had a brother he could not be a more loyal friend to her—or to you."

"CUT out the last two words!" sneered King. "It did not occur to either of you that the lady has a husband—to befriend her?"

"Women do not, as a rule, class husbands with friends. They have a higher rank. Mrs. King was sorely perplexed with regard to a matter of conscience and consulted me as she would consult her family physician were she ill in body."

"Yes! I am familiar with the cant of 'spiritual struggles' and all that. And as a soul-specialist you congratulated the patient upon the breathing time she would have while the source of her trouble spent another month on the other side of the Continent! The holiday would give you time for regular 'treatment' in the shape of daily visits seasoned with prayers and other endearments after the manner of the profession?" He arose. "The main object of my call today, Mr. Haile, was to request you to confine your visits to my house to such times as I am at home. I will not be a party to a church scandal. There have been too many of them already!"

Haile confronted him with blazing eyes and a white face.

"Do you know that you are insulting me, sir? And casting suspicion upon the name of her whom you have vowed to honor. I demand an apology as my due—and hers."

King laughed harshly. Then followed a volley of profane epithets, culminating in a blow on the chest that sent Haile reeling against the wall. Stamping out of the room, King snatched his coat and his hat, and jammed the latter upon his head just as a powerful hand grasped the back of his neck and propelled him toward the front door. This gained and opened, the assailant quietly dropped the visitor down the steps leading to the street. Two men approaching the house from different directions laid hold of him and assisted him to regain his footing as the sound of the closing door smote his ear.

little immediate prospect of success. Neither the railroad executives nor the union leaders are in a conciliatory frame of mind. Their points of view were summarized in the prediction of L. F. Loree, president of the Delaware and Hudson Railroad, that the companies would win "hands down" in a week if the strike came, and in the declaration of W. G. Lee, president of Trainmen's Brotherhood, that it is to be "the greatest of railroad strikes, a life-and-death struggle for the trainmen."

Irish Conference in Progress

FIVE Sinn Fein envoys, headed by Arthur Griffith, have been in conference with Premier Lloyd George and other British representatives in an effort to solve the Irish problem, but if real progress has been made the brief official statements have failed to chronicle it. The endeavor has been to maintain profound secrecy as to the happenings behind the doors of the Premier's official residence in Downing Street and "leaks" of information brought a protest from the Irish spokesmen.

The early sessions were devoted largely to discussion of breaches of the truce in Ireland—neither side is blameless in this—and to a consideration of means to prevent such occurrences. A sub-committee was named to devise better truce arrangements. In these talks, the delegates became better acquainted and there was a lessening of tension which will be of value when the main points of difference are reached. It was apparently the plan of the leaders to attempt an agreement on minor questions before taking up the issues most likely to split the conference.

UNION CHIEF OUSTS HOWATT. The Kansas administration of the United Mine Workers of America has been suspended by John L. Lewis, the international president, and Alexander Howatt and other officers removed because of their failure to call off strikes held to be in violation of agreements. Howatt had attained national notice because of his defiance of the Kansas Industrial Court, created after a mid-winter strike in the Kansas coal fields.

JAPANESE CONSIDER MEDIATION. The Japanese Government will try to induce China to reconsider her rejection of Japan's proposals relative to the return of Shantung to Chinese control, according to intimations in Tokio, and if China remains firm it is expected President Harding will be asked to mediate in the controversy.

NEW CENTRAL AMERICAN FEDERATION IN EFFECT. A new government covering an area of 100,000 square miles and with 4,000,000 constituents came into being when Honduras, Guatemala and Salvador were merged into the Central American Federation. Nicaragua and Costa Rica, which had been included in the plan of union, failed to ratify it, but are expected to join later.

SPANISH WIN VICTORY IN MOROCCO. Spanish troops have surrounded and captured the mountainous Gourougou region, which has been the principal base of operations for the rebellious Moorish tribesmen, according to an official announcement in Madrid. Later the Moors resumed the battle and the Spanish were compelled to relinquish a large part of the ground they had taken.

COLOMBIA RATIFIES TREATY. The Colombian Senate has ratified the treaty with the United States by which Colombia is to receive $25,000,000. The treaty was ratified by the American Senate last April.

TOMB OF ST. JOHN REPORTED FOUND. Archaeologists at work in the ruins of ancient Ephesus near the Smyrna-Aidin railway have discovered a crypt believed to be the tomb of St. John the Evangelist, according to a Paris despatch. Tradition long has ascribed his burial place to that city and scholars for many years have been endeavoring to identify his tomb.

TREATY VOTE TO BE CLOSE. Canvasses of the Senate have disclosed that the vote on ratification of the peace treaty with Germany will be close, with the Republicans probably able to muster not more than two or three votes in excess of the two-thirds majority required. Three of the fifty-nine Republican senators are opposed to ratification and only eight Democrats are counted on to vote for ratification, sixty-four votes being needed if a full Senate vote is polled. In view of this fact it was expected the final ballot would be delayed until William E. Crow, of Uniontown, Pa., qualifies as Senator Knox's successor.

"A NEW BOOK WHICH SHEDS A FLOOD OF LIGHT ON THE GREAT PROBLEMS OF THE AGES"

"PROPHECY EXPLAINED"

By DR. GEORGE H. PATCH

IN previous issues of the Christian Herald we told of the Author's purpose in writing this wonderful book, and his method of making the Bible its own interpreter. Today we give a few notable extracts from the book which will show the workings of that method.

The symbolism in Prophecy, which has been found so confusing to many owing to conflicting interpretations, is here explained in accordance with the Word itself, and in a way that will bring light and joy and consolation to innumerable hearts. Our lives here will find a nobler impulse; a new objective and purpose, in contrast with which the passion for wealth, pleasure and worldly indulgence will appear puerile and worthless. The book makes it clear that to seek the Divine forgiveness now, to serve God in loving obedience, to follow Jesus' example and love our fellowmen, are the only things worth striving for.

Some Notable Passages from the Book Itself

The Amageddon Battle

"As God dried up the Red Sea and the Jordan River for Israel to pass over, so he will dry up a passage across the Euphrates, so that the kings of the east can cross with their armies on their way to the war of the great day of God, the Almighty. They are to meet about Jerusalem to make war against the Lamb, who, as we have seen, will then be in possession of Mount Zion. Har-Magedon is the Mount of Megiddo. The great plain takes its name from this mountain and is the old battle-field on which many desperate conflicts have been fought. It is to be the scene of a slaughter greater than any in the past."

The Sentence Against Babylon

"Babylon has never yet been suddenly destroyed 'as when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah.' Dr. Seiss says: 'In the time of the apostles it was still a populous place, for both Peter and Bartholomew preached the Gospel there, and there Peter wrote his first epistle. As late as A.D. 250, there was a Christian Church there, and an influential bishopric for many years thereafter. Five hundred years after Christ, there were Jewish academies there, who issued the celebrated Babylonian Talmud. . . . And even to this present hour there is a city in the middle of the area occupied by old Babylon, containing 10,000 people, and which pays to its governor a revenue of 342,000 Turkish piasters, more than $17,000 a year. Shepherds make their folds there, as testified by all modern travelers, and Arabians pitch their tents there. It is not an utter desolation, without inhabitant, and never has been since Nimrod laid its first foundations. The sentence upon Babylon is therefore not yet fulfilled, and can not be unless that city comes up again into something of its former consequence.'"

"The Kingdom of Heaven"

"Jesus told us about the Kingdom of Heaven, not the Kingdom in Heaven. We are to pray 'Thy Kingdom come'—not to be taken to it. 'Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven.' It is a heavenly—heaven like Kingdom, on earth. We are told to lay up treasures in heaven, that our reward is in heaven, that our inheritance and citizenship are in heaven, and our names are written in heaven. But Jesus said, 'Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me to give'—etc. We do not go to heaven to get our rewards, he brings them to us. The city in which we hope to have citizenship is 'coming down out of heaven.'"

"Reigning with Christ"

"Vague ideas prevail in regard to the reign of Christians with Christ. There is no warrant for the supposition that we are to reign, or to live, on any other planet than this. We are made 'a kingdom of priests; and they reign upon the earth.' Neither are we to exalt ourselves, 'neither as lording it over the charge allotted to you.' 'The kings of the Gentiles have lordship over them; but ye shall not be so; but he that is greater among you, let him become as the younger; and he that is chief, as he that doth serve. . . . And I appoint unto you a kingdom, even as my Father appointed unto me, that ye may eat and drink at my table in my Kingdom; and ye shall sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel.' Our reigning, then, is to be a reign of service and benefaction, and not of self-aggrandizement."

Outside of the Bible itself, this book gives the strongest reassurance for both the present and the future life, and the highest encouragement to so live here and now that we may spread in other hearts the knowledge of and love for the Kingdom, the goodness of our Heavenly Father, and the assurance of the ultimate triumph of all His plans for the redemption of the world.

There are many very striking passages in Dr. Patch's book that will cause the reader to ask himself: "Why does not the Church devote more attention to Prophecy? Here we have a Christian writer, whose scholarship is evident, who is thoroughly familiar with the Bible, and whose attitude on prophetic interpretation is abundantly fortified by the language of the Word itself. He makes clear to us the meaning of many passages which the great majority of preachers avoid, although we are expressly told to 'Search the Scriptures.'"

The Present "Evil Age" and the "Age of Peace"

"The climax of all these economic changes seems to have been reached in the recent world carnage, in which every available invention and device of man was conscripted and made to add terror to warfare, and aid in the destruction of our fellowman and his works. To all who have eyes to see and ears to hear, it must be evident that God is moving as never before and bringing about these tremendous changes for some specific purpose. We have no means of knowing what his purpose is, except as He has revealed it in His Word. From this Word we learn that an age of peace and plenty, prosperity and blessedness, is to come after 'this present evil age, which is to end in disaster and judgment.'"

"It is equally evident that all these economic changes must be preparing the world for the conditions which are to prevail in that age of blessing. People will never again return to conditions of savagery or crudity, but will enjoy all the benefits of scientific research and inventive genius, modes of conveyance, methods of communication, hygienic living—everything for the betterment of living conditions, perfected and directed under the rule of the Prince of Peace. The lessons of Part Five are therefore of exceeding interest, as they deal with this grand and glorious age."

"The New Earth"

"That the whole earth is to be melted and dissipated by fire is not absolutely to be inferred from any passage in the Bible. Peter prefaces his statements about the coming of the new heaven and earth by saying that 'the world that then was'—(before the flood)—'perished.' . . . 'being overflowed with water.' 'But the heavens that now are, and the earth—a new heavens and earth after the flood—' have been stored up for fire. A world cleansed by water, and its heaven, or atmosphere, became thereby a new heaven and earth. And they will again become new in a similar sense when cleansed by fire. Such a heaven and earth, with Satan cast out of both, would correspond with the new heaven and new earth of Isa. 65 : 17."

"Fire," in the Bible, usually means literal fire, but it is also used in a figurative sense—as, 'Let my wrath go forth as fire'; 'He hath burned up Jacob like a fire'; 'I have set a fire in Egypt'; 'I will bring the third part into the fire, and will refine them'; 'I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction.' Peter speaks of a fiery trial of Christians, and of their faith being proved by fire. James (3 : 6) says 'the tongue is a fire . . . set on fire of Gehenna.' The recent wars and famines and pestilences have been sweeping like fires—great conflagrations—over the old world. The fires of this lesson are, therefore, probably literal, unless it be that the 'lake of fire' is figurative."

"The passing away of the heaven and earth of Rev. 21 : 1 seems to be the closing up of the millennial age and order, and the beginning of a new order. This is what Paul refers to in I Cor. 15 : 24; 'Then cometh the end, when he shall deliver up the Kingdom to God, even the Father.' The fleeing away of the heaven and earth of Rev. 20 : 11 seems to imply their embarrassment in that glorious Presence. They fade into insignificance before Him. Psa. 114 : 5-7 is similar to this. 'What aileth thee, O thou sea . . . ye mountains, that ye skip like rams; . . . Tremble, thou earth, at the presence of the Lord.' . . . When Israel went forth out of Egypt.' That another world conflagration is implied by this fleeing away does not seem consistent with the purpose of His presence, which is to pronounce judgment upon 'the rest of the dead,' 'the dead, the great and the small, standing before the throne.'"

A very large proportion of the letters received by the Christian Herald deal with Prophecy, showing the widespread desire for greater light on this most vital of all topics. Here is an opportunity for every one who is interested in the prophetic writings to get the light they need. And we feel that they will welcome these revelations, for Dr. Patch is not a sensational writer, nor an alarmist, but a sound and reverent Christian scholar, who diffuses comfort, encouragement and consolation in all he writes.

THERE are seven desirable qualities that soap can have; seven that soap should have to be entirely satisfactory; seven that soap must have to be suitable for universal use — shampoo, bath, toilet, nursery, fine laundry.

These essentials are: abundant lather, quick rinsing, mildness, purity, whiteness, fragrance, "it floats."

Some soaps have some of these qualities; some soaps have others; Ivory Soap combines all seven. This is why Ivory Soap is preferred for so many uses. This is why it is unsurpassed in everything it does.

Not typical British miners, despite their looks, but a group of colliery officials who did emergency work in the pits. Such shifts may be necessary in the United States should a railway strike paralyze the nation's industries as was the case in the British coal strike

When Britain Stopped Work

A Review of the Coal Strike and Labor Conditions in the United Kingdom

By JOHN G. HALLIMOND

(Superintendent of the Bowery Mission)

WHAT a nation-wide strike in one of the great basic industries means was brought most vividly before me during a visit to Great Britain last spring and summer. That visit began when the strike of British coal-miners was at its fullest effectiveness. What a general strike of railroad employees, a tie-up of the nation's transportation system, would entail in the United States can only be guessed at as this is written, but that its effects would be immediately more terrible to the country's life and industries is evident.

When we arrived in England we came upon a condition of affairs absolutely unparalleled in the history of labor. Not a miner was at work, not an ounce of coal was being hewn; stocks of coal at the collieries and wharves were practically exhausted; the use of coal for domestic purposes was abandoned; gas of wretchedly poor quality was being used for cooking, and that under the most vigorous restrictions. As we traveled through the mill districts of Lancashire and Yorkshire every loom in those vast establishments was stilled, and the chimneys were smokeless. We visited Middlesbro, that great mushroom-growth town of 140,000 inhabitants, and found the huge blast furnaces there were blown out, and sparrows were building their nests in the foundries. And there had been no strike in Middlesbro for over thirty years.

Motoring through Durham county, from Tees to Tyne, we came across thousands of idle men, whose bodies and souls were alike becoming atrophied in the terrible paralysis of non-employment.

In Sheffield the steel city, the Pittsburg of England, 13,000 smokeless chimneys rose in clear outline against a cloudless sky to tell the same story of deadly inaction.

For four months this dispute dragged on until it seemed as if not only this particular industry but the whole fabric of the British commonwealth was hanging over the frightful abyss of bankruptcy and ruin. Then in the end there came what we may call the "big wallop" to the cause of the miners. After a four months' struggle, in which the government, under Lloyd George's astute management, took a part, the miners submitted to a reduction of wages which they had been made to see was absolutely necessary to the resumption of business. But the strike in one way was a blessing in disguise, as it indisputably established the fact that such a disastrous event, costing the community $400,000,000, was an experience which must never under any consideration be repeated.

That it should occur at a time when a stoppage of production was the quintessence of folly and a crime against the commonwealth was something to be everlastingly regretted.

HUGE mistakes were made, but the most wholesome kind of lessons were learned. As Mr. Bal-four pointed out, in one of his timely addresses during the strike, that, whilst the trades union legislation of 1874 recognized the right of labor to strike, it was never intended that strikes should be used as a political weapon with which to shatter the whole industrial organization and revolutionize the social life of the country.

There can be no doubt that the prolonged discussion convinced many of the leading capitalists of the country that the unrest of labor was very largely a desire for a better and freer life. It made them feel that there must be a closer association between masters and men; that it is to the interests of capital itself that there should be a most frank and open intercourse with labor; that the suspicions of labor should be removed; and the spirit of a real brotherhood should be cultivated.

On the other hand, thinking men of the labor party realized, probably in the lurid light cast by Bolshevik flames in Russia, that the highest and best interests of the workmen can be secured only when they act in harmony with economic law; that capital is necessary; that foreign markets are necessary; that the world is poor and business can be done only at prices which a beggared world can pay; that real wealth can be produced only by work; that government subsidies are economically unsound and that government interference with trade is to be avoided at all costs; that the great desiderata of civilization today are ruthless economy, determined and indefatigable industry, and a spirit of brotherhood.

THE proof of the profound change that has been wrought in the minds and attitude of employers is amply proved in the utterances of such men as Lord

Gainford, one of the leading coal-owners, Sir William Noble, the philanthropic ship-owner of Newcastle, on Tyne, Sir Robert Hadfield, the ironmaster, and others. It is worth while quoting a few pregnant sentences from the utterances of such men.

Mr. W. L. Hitchens, Chairman of the great Cammell Laird Shipbuilding firm, said: "The fact that wages postulate a willing buyer and a willing seller of labor does not justify the employer in driving the hardest bargain he can. The interpretation of this law must be consistent with the higher moral law of our duty towards our neighbor. It is necessary for employers and employees to come into more intimate contact. I consider employees are often to blame for not exercising more sympathy than they do toward those in their employ."

Sir Robert Hadfield: "Now is the time to meet the workers in full and frank discussion of all the conditions of their common industry."

Sir William Noble: "I desire to urge upon every employer to summon his workers together, setting aside prejudice and suspicion, with a view to bringing them into knowledge of the world facts of economics, which shape and rule the destinies of business as surely and ruthlessly as the climate governs the harvest."

Lord Gainford: "Admire them! (the miners, I admire them beyond all words. What decent man would not admire their consistency, their loyalty to each other and to their leaders, their stubborn determination to stick it out. I'd like to be on the miner's side all the time."

THE desire to establish amicable relationship between the two industrial parties is mutual. Such frank and unreserved advances as I have quoted from representative employers are not likely to be treated with surly indifference on the part of the men. The miners realize the magnitude of the mistake they made in so ruthlessly menacing the third and innocent party of the state—the general public. Mr. Herbert Smith, the sturdy president of the Miners' Federation, at the annual conference at Llandudno, in September, acknowledged, in unmistakable terms, the mistakes that had been made which had caused the leading industries of the country to be paralyzed for several months, had thrown the export coal trade into the hands of foreign rivals, and had inflicted on the colliers themselves, as well as on the community at large, calamitous suffering and loss.

The flaming object lesson of Russian Bolshevism is undoubtedly impressing itself vividly on the minds of those who hitherto have looked to Marxian Socialism as a panacea for all their industrial injustices, and it is not at all an improbability that the Labor Party will consider it wise to rewrite a considerable portion of their official program. That will certainly be necessary if their hope of having a Labor Government in power is to be realized.

A fact that I feel sure American Christian people will be glad to know is that so many of the Labor leaders in England are earnest Christian men. It is this fact that creates the greatest and most glowing hopes for the future. I had the pleasure of hearing and speaking with several of these men during my recent trip, and I am quite positive of their fidelity and loyalty to the leadership of Jesus Christ.

I ASKED the Right Honorable Arthur Henderson, M. P., if I might bring a message from him to the readers of the Christian Herald such as I had just heard fall from his lips at a meeting in connection with the London Mission, held in July.

"Yes," he said, "tell them that I believe that the best way to redeem society, and make a better world is to bring the salvation of Jesus Christ to the individual man."

Mr. Henderson is a local preacher in the Wesleyan Methodist Church, and is in great demand in all parts of the country. He is a class leader, and indeed has filled all the offices possible to a layman in the church. During the exciting times of the war and the Peace Conferences in Paris, he made it a point, whenever possible, to return to London every week to meet his class. He is the recognized leader of the labor movement, and was one of the five to form the War Cabinet called into existence by Lloyd George in 1917.

The entrance of the first labor members of the House of Commons is well within my personal recollection. And splendid men they were. Thomas Burt, the Northumberland miner, afterwards a Right Honorable, the doyen of the Labor Movement, and father of the House of Commons! He had his training in Primitive Methodism, and still lives at a great age, a strong and saintly Christian. George H. Broadhurst, the stonemason, an earnest lay worker in Hugh Price Hughes's Church, in Brixton; Joseph Arch, the first leader of the Agricultural Laborers, member for South Norfolk, and called by King Edward "his own M. P."; and John Wilson, the old pilot of the Durham miners, who after delivering a brilliant speech was asked by quite a distinguished M. P. in what university he was trained. He replied, "In the Primitive Methodist pulpit."

And so among past and present labor members of the British

tist; while the Right Hon. John Hodge, Lt. Col. John Ward, and many others, have been just as much distinguished by their earnest Christian work in connection with the Brotherhood Movement, the Y. M. C. A., and other active institutions, as they have by their advocacy of the claims of labor.

IT WAS a matter of great delight to me to sit and listen to two of the younger leaders who are destined to take a great share in the work of reconstruction in the future. One is Ben. C. Spoor, the son of an old school fellow of mine. His father, grandfather, and granduncle were all earnest primitive Methodist preachers, while Mr. Spoor himself has a splendid record in Y. M. C. A. work. He has made foreign affairs a special study, is an eloquent and polished speaker, and if ever, and whenever a Labor Government is a fait accompli he is slated as its Secretary for Foreign Affairs.

The other gentleman is John Lawson, M. P., known among Durham miners as "Jack" Lawson. He went down the pit when quite a wee lad, and is now barely forty years of age. But he is a real power in his party. He is a Methodist local preacher, and I heard him make an appeal to his church, in terms of burning eloquence and with cogent logical force, to take its proper place in securing a proper distribution of wealth, and in raising the standard of living for the working class of the nation to a level more nearly in accord with Christian principles.

Besides those whose names I have mentioned there are scores of local leaders of the Labor Movement who are local preachers and devoted workers in the various churches.

That there is in the British Labor Party an element of socialism and communism, even of a somewhat rabid type, can not be denied. That this element would not hesitate to resort to extreme and violent measures if the opportunity occurred is also, unfortunately, true. But such people are in a woful minority. The great mass of people have faith in their Christian leaders, and in the Christian program. They hope, and yearn, and believe, that a day is coming when the affairs of the state will be conducted on the principles of the Sermon on the Mount. They know that the world is never going to be healed by force or saved by violence. Guns, bayonets, strikes, and lock-outs are all wrong as means of settlement.

Love, conciliation, co-operation, brotherhood, these are the stars that are beginning to shine, through the murk and mist, in the firmament of labor life in Britain.

Seventeen and Sunday School

IT SEEMS to me, now, that the Sunday school when I was a boy didn't recognize the natural impulses of the adolescent youth. When a boy came to Sunday school he was supposed to shed all the spontaneity that is the blessed charm of youth. No matter what the lesson text might be, he was to listen as attentively as he would to the boy next door telling how he'd seen Babe Ruth knock his thirty-seventh home-run. Should the Sunday school hour not be sufficiently attractive to call him each Sunday, he should come, anyway, as a matter of duty and moral obligation.

And that attitude was one of the main reasons why, when boys reached the age of sixteen and seventeen years, they dropped out of Sunday school. A boy of that age did not have, nor does he have now, any keenly developed sense of moral duty. Pleasure and genuine enjoyment will drive him harder, as they will his father, than plain, colorless duty.

A year ago last spring I reluctantly gave up my younger boys' class—lads of twelve to fourteen years. Any one who has ever taught boys of that age can understand the reluctance at leaving them. Those lads would fight you, if you accused them of being affectionate, yet at that age there is something about them that borders on affection. After Sunday school was out, they'd hang around and exchange grins with me; occasionally, one lad would link arms with me in a confidential "buddy" fashion. And then we'd walk away from the church together, a little gang of us. My adventures with this class were related some months ago in the article "Bending the Twig." I've found since that the "twig" is more pliable than then three or four years later.

When I became the teacher of the older boys, naturally I encountered another problem. No warm smiles of welcome met me. Instead, theirs was the attitude of "show-us-what-you-have." The story had to be proven to them. The younger lads believed in me, and hence believed the thoughts I tried to express to them. They needed no proof. There was none of the "show me." But this difference in attitude is not peculiar to Sunday school classes alone. It's typical of all boys of that difference in age.

ONE of the first things I asked these boys was: "Is your class organized?" I had anticipated the reply, which was: "Sure, we're organized. We got a president, a vice-president, a secretary and a treasurer."

Discussing Methods to Reach and Hold the Older Boys

By CHARLES S. KINNISON

"That's fine. Now, what do these different officers do?" I asked.

"Well—the secretary, he calls the roll, and the treasurer collects the money."

"I just dare you to interest me in Sunday School!"

"What about your president and vice-president? What are their duties?"

A sheepish grin from the boy who was president was the only answer to my question. But that grin was enough. I knew then that he was just an honorary officer. And I concluded he must be the most popular member of the class, which proved to be a fact.

Evidently this class had been organized just to give the boys the privilege and sport of voting. If there's any one thing that boys of this age like to do, it is to cast the ballot. Furthermore, they will loudly—too loudly at times—proclaim the merits of their particular candidate. To organize a class is just about the easiest thing imaginable. To make that organization function is something entirely different. But the ability of the teacher to find things for this organization to do, and to see that it does it, is a measure of his ability to hold that crowd together.

The class readily saw the futility of an organization that consisted of officers in name only. We drew parallels between their organization and those made up of men. Gradually, the viewpoint was worked around to theirs, and on that first morning the class decided that their officers must work, if I'd only say what the work should be.

At this point it is opportune to tell how the question of discipline was solved by the organization idea. The most trying part of the hour, as might be expected, is right at the beginning. The boys are full of the spirit of comradeship, and it breaks out now and then, until the teacher has gotten the lads under his control, as a good speaker does.

It was suggested to the boys that one of the most obvious duties of the president was that of acting as leader. He should play the part of the chairman, call the meeting to order and preside until the teacher was ready to take charge. And this was done. It solved the discipline problem. When that young chap would stand up in front of the class, and pound the little table a couple of times, with his fist, the class came immediately to attention. And they gave him attention while he presided.

WHEN dealing with the younger lads, I found it necessary to play the rôle of supervisor; with these older boys I acted only as advisor. They were handled on the basis of self-government, a plan that will always work with seventeen-year-old boys, because it is based on sound boy-psychology. At that

The teacher of a Sunday-School class of boys, at seventeen or any other age, must keep his wits at work. Here's a group worth the best efforts of any real man age they are self-assertive. They are developing initiative. It is their instinct to begin then to question the absolute authority of adults. They want to have a hand in affairs that concern them. And what a fine instinct that is! It is the trait that develops into the qualities of leadership in adult life.

Thus, the class handles its own affairs. I act only as the teacher of the Sunday-school lesson, but until that part of the hour comes I'm just an ordinary member of the class—sit with them as one of them, and of course, when I want to talk, then, I address the chair first, as they do. The preliminaries last about ten minutes, generally—ten minutes in which the boys have been self-assertive; ten minutes during which they felt they were "running things." It is only natural, that at the end of that time, when I take the floor, the crowd is with me. They are with me as a matter of fair play, if nothing else. At least they give me a fair chance, and that's all any teacher can expect. Given this chance, it's up to him to capitalize it. After the stage has been so ideally set for his entrance, if he is unable to hold the crowd's interest, he has no business being a Sunday-school teacher. He might be able to fool the younger chaps, but he can't bluff his way through when he is talking to boys seventeen years old.

It must be evident that, to hold a class of this age together, you must see them more frequently and for a longer time than the scant hour on Sunday morning. The boys should have the opportunity to get acquainted with you as a man, to see you in a light other than that which filters softly through the church windows. I try to show them that I am capable of doing other things than preaching platitudes at them. It is good for me and good for the boys, if they can see me laugh naturally and open-heartedly. I'm not afraid, furthermore, to give them the opportunity, at the right time, to give me a good-natured "kidding." And all this can be done without the sacrifice of dignity. To do these things is to invite the boy's confidence.

It is not unusual for him to look on me as his adult superior. I can't make him do it, nor do I want to. He wants to feel that he is just about my equal. This does not imply impudent familiarity, but rather a relationship of understanding that is most desirable for the man who wants to talk straight to boys of seventeen. I've learned not to be shocked when occasionally one of these older lads will address me, confidentially, by my given name. It is a compliment. It carries with it the thought that there is a mutual understanding of purpose and ideals between us. Isn't that a worthy situation to attain?

As I played with the younger boys, so have I romped and roughed with these older fellows. At some of the sports they're far better than I am. At basketball they'd run me till my tongue hung out, and we gave each other the rough shoulder just to show that we were all in the game. We generally did that on Saturday night. Do you think I had any trouble holding their attention on the following Sunday morning?

It is admitted there is a hazardous element in coming in physical contact with older boys. They may be inclined to think they can "hang it on you." If that spirit seems to flare up once in a while, the remedy is obvious. The necessity for action of that sort will happen only once.

BUT these lads wanted other activities than athletics. They wanted little social parties, and we had them. The girls were there, too. Last winter, we gave a party and the affair was managed entirely by the boys. The president appointed the music committee, another one to look after the decorations, and a third to handle the financial part of it. Our vice-president, as far as is practical, acts as chairman of all committees. The teacher did nothing except try to see that as few mistakes as possible be made. Boys of that age will make some errors of judgment, but as long as those mistakes are not embarrassing ones, I believe they should be allowed to make a few blunders. It teaches them a lesson. As might be expected, a financial mistake was made in handling this affair, and when the time came to pay the bills, there was not enough money. This obviously was an opportunity for the teacher to show what kind of an advisor he was, and it also illustrates the part I think a teacher should play in activities of this sort.

It should be mentioned that all these outside activities were not officially enjoyed by the boys as a "Sunday-school class." They organized a club which met twice a month. One of these meetings was of course for the boys alone for any activity they might devise. One activity of the class last winter lay in helping a needy family. Enough food was supplied to last them a month. And at Christmas, the children of that family were made happy with toys, and warm clothes that the boys of the class obtained from their mothers—clothes that the boys, or their little sisters, had outgrown.

The other meeting was of a social character in which both the boys and girls took part. These parties were always very simple affairs, and were held at the homes of the various members of the class. I tried to attend every one—not to be an overly active participant, but just to be one of the crowd.

The occasion also gave me an opportunity to observe something of the home life of the different lads, information that is certainly very useful at times in understanding the problems of the individual boy. Just as in our public schools, the teacher looks for the peculiarities of the individuals, so should the Sunday-school teacher learn all he can about the members of his class. It is much easier to do that in the public schools than in the Sunday school, because teacher and pupil are together nearly all week and the nature of the work is such that the pupils' mental processes are revealed more definitely.

It is impossible to know a boy accurately when he sees you for only thirty-five or forty minutes on Sunday morning. And if that is all that he sees of the teacher, he doesn't see enough of him. If a man is to get close to a seventeen-year-old boy, and he has to get close to him if he wants to talk religious matters to him, he must have some contact with that boy outside the atmosphere of the church. It means work to do that, but pleasant work. The need of closer contact is stressed because it certainly is beneficial. That is the main idea back of these Y. M. C. A. summer camps. Any man who has ever actively had part in these camps knows that more sound goodness can be put into a boy's heart when he's living outdoors with a two-fisted Christian man as his companion, and sleeping under the stars at night—than can be put into him in any other way.

IT IS probably a fact that I know some of the boys of my class better than their own fathers do. That fact aids me as a teacher, but it proves again the need of closer relationship between a son and his father. I remember one experience of last winter that illustrates the point. Eighteen boys were there that morning. We met in a private room. The folding-doors had been pulled shut. We all understood each other, and the privacy of the room helped. The talk led logically to a point where I might ask: "How many of you fellows have ever had an experience such that you wanted to put your head on somebody's shoulder and tell them the whole story about the thing that was bothering you?"

Every boy raised his hand.

"And whose shoulder do you lean on, then?" I asked.

Twilight Friends

By Arthur Wallace Peach

HE LOVED the dusk whose drooping wings
About His weary heart brought peace,
And hushed the clamor of the street
Till toil in slumber found release.

So when at dusk a loved one goes
Unheard though sleepless love may hover;
I know Who came and walked with him
To shining dawn beyond the dark!

Soberly, in a quiet sort of murmur, came the reply — "Mother."

"How many of you would like to tell those things to your father first?" I put to them.

Again, every boy raised his hand.

It was not within my province, I felt, to ask these boys specifically why they didn't confide in their fathers, but a little questioning showed that the only reason was that they were not well enough acquainted.

To the general attitude of these boys, there was one exception. And this lad told, with a grin, that he "went to dad first." He explained that they were "pals." And it happened that I had seen this boy and father often enough to know that he told the truth on both points.

Instead of trying to educate these boys merely on Bible topics, I feel that I have a great responsibility and opportunity in trying to teach them a suitable code of "boy ethics." I'm not claiming that Biblical history should not be given its due importance. But it just happens that my own abilities lie in the other direction, and I feel that to utilize them is the proper thing to do.

It is cheerfully admitted that these teaching methods are non-orthodox. Yet (I say it modestly) they are effective. Until mid-summer came, when a large number of the boys left town, the average attendance was seventeen. In some ways that number is too large. Yet it happens that in our little small-town church there are not enough men teachers to allow the class to be split. But if the things I say are sufficiently interesting to bring that many seventeen-year-old boys to Sunday school every Sunday, I'm glad of the opportunity to talk to them.

IT MAY be interesting to know that boys of this age can offer a prayer before their fellows. And please don't have the opinion that these lads who will rise to the feet and pray, are willy-nilly Lord Fauntleroy's. I recall that three of them are on the basket-ball team, two are regulars on the football team, while two more are "scrubs."

Their prayers are not paragons of eloquent perfection, nor are they patterned after those of the Sunday-school superintendent. But, for expressing wholesome things worthy of prayer, the prayers of these boys are of the kind that makes me want to be a better man.

It was only moderately hard to get these lads to pray. As might be expected, they said "no" when the idea was first proposed, but when they learned that my idea of prayer was not a mere expression of eloquence, they gradually became willing to offer prayers themselves. It is not my intention to try to create the impression that these boys are eager to pray or that they pray with the same confidence that an adult does. The point is, however, that they can and do pray for very sensible things, before a crowd of boys of their own age. I recall, for instance, that one lad in his prayer asked that all the boys would so live that week that they could look their mothers squarely in the eyes when Saturday night came. That thought showed that at least this one boy was conscious of the temptations which confronted him. He apparently realized his own weaknesses.

It may be interesting to know of a church activity which has been effective in keeping these lads fairly interested in church. Once a month, on Sunday evening, eight of these boys and an equal number of girls of their age constitute the choir. One of the boys acts as organist, and he's a good one. They furnish music that is a welcome change. And their presence in the choir also tends to bring their parents to church. Giving young people of this age something definite to do, giving them a responsibility that is not a colorless one, is a very good way of keeping them interested in church.

The recounting of these experiences with this class is not to prove that I am a good Sunday-school teacher. I'm not at all sure that I'm a good teacher. Sometimes I think I'm not. Men sometimes spend the greater part of their lives seeking the answer to the great question: "Why was I born—why am I here?" On certain Sunday mornings, I find myself asking that question. But thankful I am, that on most of those mornings, I feel that I've found the answer. The answer lies in those eighteen lads who sit in front of me, giving me the great chance—the chance to start them on the right road.

Fascinating Rivers I Have Seen

By REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D.

Massachusetts, where seven generations of his ancestors had resided, to brave the unknown perils of a pioneer on the upper waters of the Ottawa, living with Indians and backwoodsmen that he might make known the untold forest riches of America's vast timberland. But roaring, rushing torrent and crushing rocks will test your muscle and your skill to the very utmost, if you would get through safely into the calm waters below.

I have seen many great rivers since, but few more calm and powerful when unopposed, few more angry and raging when tearing past rocks and rapids, than the Ottawa.

Americans may well be proud of having, with one exception, the greatest of waterways wholly within its boundaries—the magnificent Mississippi. But noble as is its sweep of waters, it does not strike the traveler as especially picturesque. Its glories are utilitarian rather than idealistic. It waters a splendid valley, which for richness from its headquarters on the upper Missouri to its debouchement in the Gulf of Mexico, is, I suppose, unsurpassed in all the world for inexhaustible productiveness.

Some people, especially some English travelers, who write their impressions of America after a week's stay on our shores, would say that the Mississippi is typical of the American character—big, productive, utilitarian, turning mud into money, but lacking in beauty, and the idealism of the hills. I deny the accusation, both for America and for the Mississippi. Americans and Canadians are idealists. Their hearts are touched by the cry of hunger as the hearts of no other people, and in their ideals of peace on earth and good-will to men they lead the world.

The Mississippi, too, does not contribute only corn and cotton to our national welfare. It grows roses and stately forests and parks. Its valley is filled with contented homes. It has made possible great cities where a thousand philanthropies abound, and where art and literature flourish.

There are other rivers in North America, too, that disprove the muddy, materialistic views which some foreigners ascribe to us. The Connecticut is one of these. It is lined with colleges and institutions of culture, from upper New Hampshire to its emergence into the sea in Southern Connecticut. Part of my boyhood and all my college days were spent upon its banks. For varied and entrancing scenery, from the Connecticut lakes to the ocean, few rivers can surpass it. In places it roars through narrow gorges as at Bellows Falls; then it quietly meanders through smiling meadows. Here high hills hem it in and contract its waters; there it spreads itself out like a peaceful lake. Here it turns mill-wheels which ten thousand horses could not move; there it makes productive the farmer's teeming acres.

THE St. Lawrence, too, is a fascinating river. It has the most abundant source of supply of any river in the world, emphatically, the Great Lakes—inland seas, rather. It can never run dry. A hundred years of drought would scarcely affect its flow. As one sees the scores of dry river-beds in Europe, the torrente of Italy, for instance, where one crosses a mile of arid, stony river bottom that holds not a drop of water in the dry season, he longs for a glimpse of the majestic St. Lawrence, plowing its way between two great nations, decked with a thousand islands, always full to its banks, though seldom overflowing, until it comes to rest in the great gulf to which it gives its name.

On the historic and picturesque banks of the Nile

THERE is something fascinating about any river, even more than about a lake. Where did it start? Where is it going? Of course, literally we can answer these questions. We can trace the stream upward, growing smaller and smaller, to its very source in some mountain lake or some gushing mountain spring, like the Sacramento, which brings luxuriance and vast productiveness to the great valley that bears its name.

Or we can trace its flow the other way, until it loses itself in the ocean that swallows it up as eternity swallows up our little lives. Indeed, much of the fascination of a river is that it is a symbol of life. Even if we do not stop to reason it out, we feel the analogy.

It begins very small, in the merest trickle of water, perhaps. It gathers strength with every mile. It sweeps on with ever-increasing momentum. It ripples over the shallows and glides solemnly over the depths. It sparkles in the sunlight and glooms under the clouds, and at last sweeps on into the bosom of the known and all-embracing. In every mile we see a reflection or illustration of my life and yours, my reader. Thank God that the eternity to which we are hastening is no black ocean of stormy, tumultuous billows, but is illumined by the light of His presence and calmed by His voice who once said to wave-tossed Galilee, "Peace, be still."

However, this is not a sermon but a descriptive article concerning some rivers I have actually seen. I was born on the banks of a great river, the Ottawa, on whose broad bosom the sturdy pines and hemlocks and spruces that grow on ten million acres are borne down to the sawmills of lower Canada and thence distributed in the form of boards and lumber to the very ends of the earth. I take pride in the fact that my father, who died before my earliest memory can tell me how he looked or spoke, was a genuine pioneer on this great river, and its greater mother, the St. Lawrence, on whose banks he died a victim of the cholera which, in 1853, swept thousands of strong men into untimely graves.

he had a lovely Christian home to return to after these explorations in the wilderness, and the noblest of Christian women to brighten this home, and here I was born in 1851, near the city of Ottawa, then an insignificant village, called Bytown.

POSSIBLY my love for rivers dates from those earliest days when I opened my eyes on the majestic river that swept by our home, a river which there is three miles wide. One of my earliest recollections is of the great rafts of logs, sometimes twenty acres in extent, which were continually floating by in summertime. On these rafts the lumbermen lived for weeks at a time in their long, slow journey down the river. The logs were assembled and bound together securely, huts were erected on the rafts for shelter, fires were built, and meals prepared while the leisurely current did the work of sails and steam power.

To be sure, the raftsmen were provided with great sweeps—ordinary oars would have been useless—and when they reached the Chaudiere Falls, near the site of Ottawa city, then look out, sturdy boatmen! The

A scene on the River Jordan, ever sacred to the hearts of Christians

It must be admitted, however, even by staunch Americans, that Europe's rivers are more picturesque than our own. This is partly owing to the older civilization which has for two thousand years adorned their banks with castles and towers and ivy-grown ruins, and partly because they run their comparatively short courses through innumerable towns and cities of historic and literary interest.

The Rhine, for instance, has no double in America since its every mile tells a story of the past, which goes back to Roman times and before. The Danube, the Vistula, and the Volga, tell a different story but a story of an ancient civilization, of battles lost and won, of dynasties that once flourished, grew old and decayed. Our rivers tell only of red Indians and white pioneers.

One of the mightiest and in some respects one of the most fascinating rivers on which I ever sailed is the mighty Amur.

For twenty-two days the little steamer on which I sailed plowed its waters from Khabarovsk, five hundred miles from its mouth, to Stretinsk, in the region where its chief tributary, the Shilka rises among the encircling hills of Siberia.

At the beginning of the voyage the river was majestically broad, two miles and a half at least, though it had not yet begun to gather up its skirts for its plunge into the Arctic seas, half a thousand miles away.

Through no barren waste (our popular idea of Siberia) does it flow, but much of its course is through flower-decked meadows and sometimes past magnificent natural parks of giant trees.

For two thousand miles we stemmed its torrent, changing two or three times, from a larger ship to a smaller one, as the channel grew narrow and shallow, until, at last, we could go no farther by boat, but had to take a ramshackle branch of the Trans-Siberian railway for Lake Baikal, a thousand miles or so from Stretinsk. No river ever gave me a sense of mightier sweep and power than the Amur, as we were borne on its tide through the future vast empire of boundless Siberia. Doubtless the geographies of 2021 or 2121 A.D. will tell of great cities on its banks, and of billions of bushels of grain garnered from its prairies, and millions of cattle fattened on its lush meadows.

BUT of all the great rivers I have sailed on none has begun to equal the two whose banks are lined by no trees or grass or shrubs. They have nothing but water boundaries, banks of tumbling waves. Yet they are distinct, well-defined, inexhaustible rivers, that do more, perhaps, for the welfare of the world, than any others. I refer, of course, to the Gulf Stream and the Antarctic Current. The one warms and makes habitable the nations of northern Europe; the other cools and makes habitable the dry, equatorial regions of western South America.

Sixty miles wide is the Gulf Stream, pushing its way irresistibly from the Gulf of Mexico up the coast, cutting across the North Atlantic, leaving the shores of France, Britain and Scandinavia. Without its warming, vivifying influence, millions of people would die or be obliged to go south, and scores of cities would be uninhabitable. Two hundred miles north of the Arctic Circle it keeps the fjords of Norway free from ice the year around, and I have sailed in mid-January, without an overcoat, on these Arctic waters, where the sun had not risen above the horizon for more than a month.

On the other great inter-oceanic river, the Antarctic Current, my cheek has been fanned by the breezes, and my morning bath cooled, by the water of this life-saving cold current which brings life, vigor and energy, and a vast multitude of people, and entices

St. Paul's birthplace, with the sea, and made Tarsus at one time the great city of the Mediterranean. Up its channel Cleopatra sailed in her luxurious barge, when she captured the heart of Mark Antony, and world-shaking events occurred on its shores.

The Abana, which still flows through old Damascus making it a garden of the gods, gorgeous with flowers and lovely with its miles of citrus and other fruit trees, is not wide or deep, but, for four thousand years, it has been one of the famous, fascinating rivers of the world.

Here came Abraham, whose "steward" lived in Damascus. Very likely he bathed in the Abana, and he must have drunk of its waters, for Damascus, then as now, had not other water supply besides the Abana and Pharpar.

Here lived General Naaman, who considered the Abana and Pharpar, its nearby companion, far superior to the despised Jordan, until his wise servants persuaded him to try the prophet's prescription.

St. Paul, too, must have drunk of the Abana after he had taken a long walk through the hot "street called Straight," and when he was afterwards concealed in the chamber of the wall from which he was let down in a basket, he must have been refreshed by Abana's waters.

At Frankfort-on-the-Rhine, a river every mile of which tells a story of the past incredible numbers of edible fish and birds to the barren shores of Peru and Chile.

Truly, "God is good to all and His tender mercies are over all his works."

But all the fascinating rivers are not big ones, by any means. Do you remember, dear reader, the little brook where, as a child, with a bent pin and a tow string, you attempted to beguile your first minnow? Do you remember still later when you achieved a real hook and rod and captured your first game fish, a trout or pickerel? I do, and the historic Charles, near Boston, will always have a special significance for me, not on account of Bunker Hill, but because I remember how I triumphantly bore home from its banks a twelve-inch pickerel, too excited even to take it off the hook, for it was my first "real fish."

SOME of the great rivers of history, which I have seen, are not by any means mighty streams. For mere size they pale into insignificance beside the Mississippi or the Nile or the Amur, but what a big place they occupy in literature! The Meander, for instance, which meanders through the green meadows and between the fig orchards of Asia Minor, not far from historic Laodicea and Colossae, a river which gave not only verdure and beauty to historic lands, but a new word to the English language.

The Cydnus, also, is not great in length or volume, but, when widened and deepened, it connected Tarsus,

I followed the short course of this famous stream to its source in a great, gushing fountain that springs out of the rocky hillside some twenty miles from Damascus. Surely few rivers, though reckoning their length by thousands of miles, have a longer history.

The Jordan, too, the river of all rivers sacred to Christian hearts, is insignificant if mere size is considered. A brawling stream in its upper courses dashing itself to pieces against jagged rocks, flowing sullenly through dark defiles, broadening out into a muddy, sluggish stream as it makes its way through reeds and rushes and a tangled wilderness where wild beasts lurk, until it loses itself in the bitter waters of the Dead Sea, which in all these centuries it has never been able to sweeten.

Considered simply as a stream of water there are a thousand rivers more commanding, but there is none so fascinating. For here the children of Israel crossed as on dry land when God commanded its waves to stand back. Here John the Baptist preached and warned the people of righteousness and judgment to come, and here our blessed Lord bent His head beneath the waves, which will evermore be sacred, and was baptized of John, that He might fulfil all righteousness. Here the Holy Spirit like a dove descended upon Him, and thenceforth the mightiest river in all the continents gave way and acknowledged that the Jordan was its superior, in the love and honor and fascination it held for every devout heart.

The Churches and Disarmament

RESPONSES to the Christian Herald's proposal that the churches of the United States make their influence felt in support of the program for the coming Conference on Limitation of Armaments continue to be received by the score. Every mail brings additional Peace Endorsement resolutions, and the memorial to be presented to President Harding will be an imposing one.

Arrangements have been made for Mr. Graham Patterson, publisher of the Christian Herald, and Dr. Charles M. Sheldon, editor-in-chief, to present the memorial to President Harding at the White House Executive Offices on November 7, four days in advance of the opening of the Conference. The individual membership represented in the churches and other organizations which have subscribed to the Peace Endorsement resolution published in this magazine already is well over the million mark, as nearly as it may be estimated, and at the rate at which responses are coming in as this issue goes to press upwards of two million American citizens will be represented in the memorial when it is presented to the President to hearten him in his efforts to bring nearer the attainment of world peace.

Below are additional responses from American churches:

First Friends Church of Chicago has expressed its approval of President Harding's purpose in calling a conference on the limitation of armaments. As is well known, the Society of Friends has stood firmly against war and all preparation for war for more than two hundred and fifty years. It is therefore with a sense of satisfaction that we note this action and the support given it by the churches. We are earnestly hoping that the movement will continue until by the gradual reduction of armaments only that is retained which is necessary for exercising police power. We will continue to work and pray with you that the Prince of Peace may control all the relations of men and nations."

Wrestling with the Husband Problem

I HOPE it has been quite clear to those who have been interested in the problems of an average home as stated by the Mere Man, that it has been impossible to name all of them or even to suggest some of the most important which are very evidently omitted in the brief outline given. But I am not stating the problems that face every family, only a few of those which have come into my own experience.

In speaking of the Husband Problem I do not pretend for one moment that I have named all the things which make a husband a problem in a home. But I am trying to name a few of the things that were most troublesome in my own experience, and it is probable that the same experiences occur in other husbands' lives.

In the first place I hope I have made it clear that I have a real love for my home, and believe in it as the greatest institution in this republic. I fell in love with my wife before I married her, and I have been falling more in love ever since. I don't believe a man lives who thinks more of his wife and children than I do, even if I am only a Mere Man. After saying that, I am ready to make a confession or two. That is what this Problem amounts to.

The first thing that occurs to me to mention in the nature of a problem so far as my wife is concerned, centered around a little matter of my habits as an eater.

I am a very healthy animal and enjoy my meals. But like a good many American men I have come to look upon food as something to be put into the system very much as coal is put into a furnace. And a short time after my oldest son was old enough to observe the way his father did things, I overheard him say to the Girl, his sister, when he did not know I was in the next room: "I wish father wouldn't eat like that. It makes mother feel bad."

That morning, after the children had gone off to school, I sat where I had heard that remark, wondering just what the boy meant, and just what it was that made his mother feel bad. I went over in my mind all the eating habits I had, and finally decided if I had any habits that made my wife feel ill at ease at the table I would try to correct them, for I am one of a few men who have a hearty contempt for any one who cannot change a bad habit as he gets older. I am fifty-five, but I believe any man ought to be able to change his habits up to one hundred. After that, it won't make much difference with the folks here.

THE next time the family was at the table, I started in on a careful system of eating that would be free from criticism, knowing from the boy's remark that I was being observed. The first thing I noticed about myself was a habit I had acquired of pushing my food with my knife in my right hand upon my fork which I held in my left, and then inserting the food that stayed on the fork into my mouth. It was an English habit I had learned from an old English business friend with whom I had visited once when a business trip across the water took me to London.

But as I noticed how often I missed part of the food I pushed on the fork, and wondered at the time why forks were not made with six tines instead of four, I began to think perhaps the English habit could not be Americanized, or at least that I had failed to master it, the same as I never could master chop sticks when I went into a Chinese restaurant in New York.

So I switched over to the United States habit of cutting up my meat with my knife and then shifting the fork over to my right hand. The boy looked rather queer as he watched me, but I never said anything.

Then it occurred to me that I had been getting through my meals ahead of the rest of the family, so I slowed up, and just for the sake of seeing what the result would be I lingered over the toast and sipped my coffee so leisurely that I actually was eating something when all the rest of the family were through.

"You do not seem to be in any hurry this morning," my wife said pleasantly. Then the Boy snickered. And the Girl smiled and I felt foolish, but there was a twinkle in my wife's eye that paid me for the effort it had cost me to slow up.

"No," I said; "business is not rushing particularly just now."

"First time I ever saw father finish last," said the boy.

My wife looked over across the table at me with a grave look, that, as I looked back, brightened into a smile and then into a laugh. It was the same kind of a laugh that she used to have when I was courting her.

"It is healthier to eat slowly," I said, speaking to the boy, with dignity. "Whatever you do as you grow up, take plenty of time for your meals."

I cannot dwell on this item, but enough to say that as I went on, I soon found out what the things were that made my wife "feel bad" when I ate. And really when you stop to think that in most homes at least twice a day all the year around most husbands and wives sit opposite each other to eat food, it does make some difference how they eat it. And if a man can't change a bad habit of eating to please his wife, I am sorry for him, and even more sorry for her.

THE next thing I remember that caused me to be a Problem centered around the item of finances. And this, I learned many times afterwards, is the rock on which many a fair craft of matrimony splits.

I had, of course, from the very first of our married life, paid all the household bills, grocery, gas, telephone, water, clothing, furniture, repairs, insurance, taxes, and everything else that makes a home worth while, and some that don't.

I had also at different times given my wife sums of money with which to buy what I supposed she needed, and for personal expenses about which I had a rather vague vision, calling it in my mind "pin money."

But one day when I happened to be worried a little about my business, my wife timidly asked me for some money. It was an unusual request and I said without thinking of how it sounded to her, "What do you want money for?"

She did not answer me, only looked at me as I had never seen her look before. And I remember I went away to my business, and was unhappy and uneasy all day thinking over that look.

Business took a happy turn that afternoon, and I came home at night feeling better. But the first glance at my wife showed me she had been crying.

That took me up with a short turn and a square hitch. I remembered what I had said to her in the morning when I had asked her what she wanted money for.

And right then and there I called her the old foolish names of our courting days, and begged her pardon for my short word.

"You can have all the money you need," I said. And I pulled out all I had in my pocket and handed it to her.

She smiled through her tears, and handed it back. "I don't want it that way," she said.

"What way do you want it?" I said, somewhat bewildered.

"I wonder," she replied timidly after her fashion, "why I should have to need to ask you for money. Isn't there some way in which some kind of arrangement could be made—"

She paused, and I did not just know how to go on, but I said I would think the matter out.

AND I did think it out, and we have a definite money plan in our home that we find works for mutual happiness. It may not work in your home, but it does in ours; and this is the story of our home, not some one else's.

I found out after we had had a very frank and loving conference over the entire money matter, that for instance why my wife wanted some money that particular morning was to meet certain obligations she had assumed for her share in the federated woman's club. The women were putting up a club house, and my wife wanted to have a share in the building. There were also coming due certain amounts of money she had felt obliged to pledge on missionary and young woman's association work, and a number of other calls that were within our means, and that meant keeping up my wife's reputation as a social worker.

"Good heavens!" I exclaimed to myself as all these things gradually came into my knowledge, "what a grouch and worse I have been all these years. Here is my wife, as much a breadwinner as I am, taking care of the house and the children while I am downtown, cooking the meals, mending the clothes, training the children, working fourteen hours to my ten, and earning money, for it would cost me at least half I earn in my business if I had to hire a housekeeper and a cook and a manager. And I dole out to her a few dollars now and then, and expect her to get along somehow and be humiliated by asking me as a great favor to let her have a little money, as if she had not earned it, just as much as if she were an expert housekeeper and teacher as she really was." In brief this is the arrangement we made, with some modifications as experience made it necessary to change it.

I had a regular income of about $3,500 a year. Of this amount I turned over to my wife every month enough to meet all the household expenses of living, such as groceries, clothing, and all the items that centered about the keeping of the house as a home. And I want to say right here that she managed the buying and use of all things so well as to cut down considerably most of the items that make up the household expenses.

Over and above all these items I gave to my wife to bank in her own name enough money to provide for all other necessary expenses outside of the immediate carrying on of the family living, so that she would not have to come to me for special occasions, and would have as her own for charitable and church and social work a certain amount which would be within our income and which we found as time went on, varied only a little from the limit we had to set, each of us making the agreement that any unusual expenditure would be the subject of mutual conference.

I wish I had more time to go on with this item. I heard the other day of an old friend of mine who has gone shipwreck on this money question in his home. I think I came pretty near the breakers, but clawed away from the shore just in time.

I FIND as I go on that I have been a problem in my home on account of the easy-going habits I have had in the training of my children. I find on going over all my many failings that I have neglected my children, and as they have grown up I have had little to do with their religious instruction. I have left that to my wife, and perhaps it is better so. But speaking of religion, there is another place where I am sure I have disappointed my family. I have already told you how I got back into the Sunday school life. And nothing I ever did ever pleased my wife more or benefited me more.

But I am quite sure at times when I consider my shortcomings as a Mere Man and a Father and a Husband, that I am a good ways from the religious influence I ought to be. We dropped the Family Altar out of our home several years ago. I know that my wife tries to keep it up in her own way, and when the children were little I know she would always read the Bible to them and teach them their prayers when they were put to bed, while I sat down-stairs reading the evening paper.

I revolve these matters a good deal as the years pass. I know they make problems for the dearest woman in the world.

One thing I am certain about. The cause of many unhappy homes and broken families is absent from ours. We have never been untrue to each other. Whatever faults I may have, that tragedy has never cast a cloud over us. I suppose I am as much of a Problem as most Husbands, but not that kind of a problem, thank the good God.

And the more I ponder over the many things that may contribute to make a Home either heaven or hell on earth, the more I am inclined to think that most of the problems can be worked out, and happiness secured, if love is at the basis of the married life, and a mutual agreement to carry the load of responsibility and privilege together. And God must be there, and religion as the foundation. Of that I am profoundly convinced as the years go by, and my Husband duties become clear.

OF ANOTHER thing I have become sure as the years pass on. I must give more time to the life and plans of my children. I am appalled as I think of the neglect I have been guilty of in letting my children have the rag end of my time and thought. I have devoted to business and to golf and to Chambers of Commerce and to clubs of various kinds and to banquets and to other doings at least ten times as much time and thought as to my wife and children. I am surprised to find as time goes on how easy it is for me to turn over all the part of the home that belongs to the children to my wife.

I have an obligation as a father that I must assume. My wife is the best person in the world that I know and I do not know what would happen if she should be taken away from us. I want to take my place with her in the responsibility of making a Home.

The lack of that quality is, I understand, from recent figures in the Juvenile Courts, the one lack that causes homes to break down. I want to create a home, as much as a business. And my daily prayer now is that so far as in me lies I may do that great thing.

There is an old Arab proverb that to be a full grown man one must do three things! Build a home, write a book, and rear a son. I can never write a book, but by the grace of God I want to do the other two, even if I am only a Mere Man.

A Story of a City Church

By MARION HARLAND

Illustrated by William C. McNulty

ONE of the men who assisted Rupert King to regain his footing after his dramatic ejection from the Haile home was a stranger. The other was Anslem Miller. As the stranger looked up wonderingly at the house, Miller spoke authoritatively to him:

"Will you kindly call that taxicab?" pointing to a passing vehicle. "I will take him home. He is a friend of mine."

The man obeyed, lifted his hat and walked away. Not until he had gone did King bethink himself that his name had not been spoken by his tactful "friend." Not a sentence was exchanged between the pair. Neither of them broke the impressive silence until they were within a few blocks of the King residence.

"I will try to thank you, Mr. Miller, when I get my wits," said King then. "At present the one idea uppermost in my brain is that perhaps, after all, I only got what was coming to me."

Which morsel of slang was faithfully transmitted to his chief by the mystified assistant pastor.

Mrs. King was not at home, and as the master of the house passed up the stairs to his own room, he ordered that a cup of very strong coffee should be brought to him instead of the afternoon tea usually served at that hour. He had eaten nothing since breakfast, and refused audience to clerks and clients. He was faint with inanition and the tempest of emotion that had swept through soul and mind. Yet when his wife returned, bright-faced and eager in praise of the concert she had attended in company with Mrs. Haile, he was dressed for dinner and reading the evening paper in the library.

THE evening meal was partaken of cheerily so far as the wifely part in the dialogue went. She detected nothing unusual in his manner of listening to her play of fun and fancy. Not until the ceremony was concluded and the two could converse without risk of being overheard was the incident of the afternoon revealed to the horrified auditor. To his credit, be it told, Rupert King did not gloss over the part he had borne in the fateful colloquy:

"Yes? I swore at him—a minister of the gospel—in his own house, a thing no man who had any right to be called a gentleman would ever do. And called him by every vile name in the calendar. When he plucked up courage to answer like a man, I struck him—a blow that would have knocked him down if he had not fallen against the wall. I got my deserts when he put me out into the street. I have made a clean breast of the whole matter to you. It was the only honest thing left to me. I have been insane all morning, if ever a man was crazy. Now you know it all. Heaven help us both! How much truth is there in that tale? I have never caught you in a lie in all the years we have lived together. I am not going back on the word now. I can't help it. I swear to you. I will believe every word you speak!"

She had listened with dilated eyes, and lips compressed into a thin hard line. Laying aside the embroidery she had not feigned to touch for half-an-hour, she came across the space separating them and knelt at his side.

"I will keep back nothing. If I were disposed to prevaricate, your candor would shame me into speaking the truth. I told Mr. Haile that I was very unhappy sometimes, because there was such incompatibility in our tastes and feelings upon some subjects. I wondered if we would not be more contented if we did not try to live together. Don't be very angry with me, dear! I ought to have looked my misgivings in my own heart and not confessed them to a fellow-creature. Oh! pity me when I say that Mr. Haile thought the same, although he handled the matter very delicately. From the first, he was firm in the persuasion that there should be no thought of a separation now or ever. He reminded me of the solemn vow I had made before God and man—the most sacred oath that can bind one human being to another. He showed me that I had no just cause for meditating such a step. He talked of your fine qualities and invariable generosity and indulgence to all my whims."

"What faults you had were superficial, he said, and did not change the real worth of a character that has won the respect of all who know you as you are. Finally, as gently as if he had been dealing with a wayward child—and indeed that is what I am!—he asked if I had done all in my power to lessen the distance between us. That set me to thinking seriously."

I never really made a business of self-examination before. You would not care for me any more if you knew what ugly things I think within myself. I vowed again, and with all my soul, to begin a new life, and with God's help to try to be a better woman, a better wife and a more consistent Christian."

He lifted her, weeping, to his breast and petted her as her mother might have done.

"We will work together, little wife!" It was a solemn pledge.

"You would not care for me any more if you knew what ugly things I think within myself"

CHAPTER XVIII

THE June communion at which Rupert King made a public confession of his faith in Christ was marked in Stuart Haile's memory with a white memorial milestone.

Sitting in solitary musing upon the events of the past two months that Sabbath evening, his heart swelled with devout thankfulness.

"Thy way is in the sea and Thy path in the deep waters!"—escaped his lips in the retrospect. The floods of great waters had gone over his soul during the sleepless night succeeding the incidents recorded in the last chapter. He had been sitting just here that night, the Book from which he had read at family prayers on the stand before him and his aching head bowed upon it, when a note was brought to him by his wife.

"It came by special messenger," she had said quietly, but lively solicitude was in her face.

She had stood still beside him while he tore it open.

"DEAR SIR": (Haile had held the note so that she could read it with him. "I behaved like a brute yesterday. How soon may I come to beg you to forgive me? Please telephone reply. KING."

The conversation that had ensued laid the foundations of a lifelong friendship. As Haile had surmised rather than divined, the rough crust of the self-made man's nature concealed unsuspected elements of rare excellence. His repentance for the shameful part he had played in the library scene was sincere and thorough.

"The devil entered into me when I read that infamous letter," was his version of the history of what must be an everlasting regret. "I was as mad as if I had been drunk. You brought me to my senses by playing the man when I had acted the rôle of a beast. If you had kicked me down the steps instead of letting me down easy, I believe I should have respected you still more."

HAILE laughed now in recalling it. A smile that grew tender as he recounted to himself the steps by which the honest penitent of his transgressions against his fellow-man had been led, at first through affection and respect for that leader, to a perception of his greater transgression against Him to Whom he owed all that made life worth the living.

"The old, old story!"—mused the minister. His was the richest reward that man can receive in the life that now is—the knowledge that he has been a co-worker with the Redeemer of mankind in saving a soul from death and turning a sinner from the error of his ways.

The change in Rupert had been no half-way reformation. Without being blatant, he had let it be known in private and in business life that he was thinking and acting along a different and higher plane than ever before. When, with the cordial consent of his pastor, he expressed the intention of presenting himself for admission to the Church, the session rejoiced and were exceedingly glad.

The church was crowded to overflowing that Sabbath afternoon. It was a goodly line of men and women that blessed the eyes of the shepherd of souls as he recited to them the vows that were to control thought, belief and action.

As he sat in his study that evening, the rosy twilight of a perfect June day softened the outlines of roof and tower. The husbandman who had harvested much golden grain that day, noted it in his diary as a "Midsummer Thanksgiving Day."

Now and then the muffled sound of sacred music arose from the library below. Mrs. Haile was faithful in the observance of "the Children's Hour" no matter how crowded the Sabbath might be with other engagements. Her boy and girl had inherited musical taste and ear from both parents, and the mother had taken pleasure in cultivating the decided talent they showed. The fine "boy-soprano" of Stuart, Jr., had already won for him an enviable reputation in Sunday-school oratorios and concerts. The father hearkened in his reverie, to trio, a duet and solo, that arose fitfully but musically to his ears.

As a familiar air was played on the piano as a prelude to a hymn his wife had written and set to the ever-sweet, how-ever old Cradle Hymn, he arose, treading lightly lest he apprise the musicians of his intention, and set the door wide open.

The unobstructed words and air floated up to his seat in the alcoved window:

"Soft the shades of evening fall,
Twilight with its friendly pall,
Folds about earth's beating heart,
Bids the weary day depart.
Through the cool and fragrant air,
Our Father! hear our evening prayer!"

THAT evening, when having seen the happy children to their beds, Anita joined her husband in the library, he referred to the Evening Hymn:

"The weird, sweet old melody has a fascination for me. It was a fitting close to the happiest day I have had in this city. It has been 'round and perfect as a star.' I have worn the quotation threadbare, you may say, but it will bear much usage."

Short Editorials on Long Subjects, by Dr. Sheldon

The Unemployed

THERE are three classes. Those who can work and won't. Those who want work and can't. Those who can't work and don't. We can take care of those who can work and won't, and those who can't work and don't. But the problem of furnishing work for those who want work and can't find it is a problem so great that the entire brains of a Hoover are not too much (excuse us, Mr. Hoover, for saying it) to solve the problem.

Much can be done by local authorities, Chambers of Commerce, and churches, and by individual citizens. The Methodists used to boast that they had a man for every church and a church for every man. If the state could boast that there was work for every man and a man for every kind of work, it would mark one step nearer the perfect civilization we say we want.

Meanwhile we seem to have heard several housekeepers say, our own among the number, "With all the cry about unemployment, we can't find any one in the town to come in and do our housework." Wonder how many "unemployed" men might get good jobs in good homes if they were willing to swallow a little pride and learn how to cook and look after a home! We know one minister who has lost his church on account of deafness and is now working happily in an apartment house as a servant. What is the difference between the pulpit and the potato masher? Not any, only more demands from the kitchen than the kirk.

Coal-Miners and Law

A SIGNIFICANT triumph for law and order has been won by the action of President Lewis of the United Mine Workers in suspending the local union of coal-miners in District 14, the district that has been the source of so much disorder and strikes in southwestern Kansas for a quarter of a century. This suspension order is a vindication of the action of the Kansas Industrial Court which tried Alexander Howat, the miners' leader, for disobedience to the court's orders, and he is now serving a six-months jail sentence after a trial.

President Lewis says in his order of suspension: "The joint agreement between miners and operators in the state of Kansas has been trampled upon by individuals who seemingly have no respect for the honor of their organization or the principles of fair dealing among men."

This statement is not the declaration of the operators nor even of the Industrial Court, but it comes from the coal-miners' own national body. The effect of it will be to discredit the lawless leadership of men who have denounced publicly the officers of the law and the law itself in Kansas.

It is interesting to note that out of 33 cases that have come before the Kansas Industrial Court for adjudication where there have been learned counsel on both sides, 31 cases have been accepted without appeal by both sides, thereby sustaining the Industrial Court in its ruling. The Chief Justice of the Kansas Supreme Court is quoted as saying that this record establishes a new court record for the state, and possibly for every other state of the union. In other words the Industrial Court, which has been ridiculed and attacked by lawyers and sociologists, has been sustained in its decisions in 31 out of 33 cases by the very parties, both representing capital and labor, who were most deeply interested in disputing any decision that was in any sense unfair or unjust. The fact that both sides have abided by the court's findings is a triumph for law and order, and also a recognition of the Court's soundness in law.

The Bolshevik Failure

IN HIS very illuminating volume, "The Breakdown of Communism," Leo Pasvolosky puts the whole matter of government by officialdom into one sentence: "Communism is impossible without the application of compulsion in the economic life of the country; but economic production is impossible with the application of such compulsion."

In the long list of experiments made by the human race to produce economic ideals, practically all of them up to date have been failures because they have not taken into account the human element. Laws by themselves cannot produce economic results. Force of government control cannot make men do what they don't want to do, even when the penalty is death.

The only form of economic idealism that will ever succeed will be that form which employs in the highest degree the principles of the Golden Rule. Look up the Nash business in Ohio and see how it works practically. Bolshevism has broken down economically because it has scorned the divine element and had no use for the moral factor. No scheme of business by the state or the individual will ever succeed which leaves out of the account the principles of Jesus.

Mental Disease

DR. HORATIO M. POLLOCK, statistician of New York State Hospital Commission, in a recent report says:

"The burden of mental disease is each year becoming heavier. The ratio of patients with mental disease under treatment in institutions per 100,000 of population increased from 118 in 1890 to 220 in 1920. The economic loss to the nation on account of mental disease now amounts to over $200,000,000 a year. As less than one-fourth of those who develop psychoses are cured, no permanent relief can come from treating patients in hospitals."

Here is another case where prevention is better than cure, or attempts at cure. And another score is laid up against that old enemy of the race, Mars. The war has developed in Europe a generation of incapables. Professor de Lapouge says, "In Russia eugenical inheritance may be considered to be entirely destroyed. In France the best of our young men have perished or have become invalids in the proportion of at least 2 to 3."

And yet there are people who have been to college and some who are members of churches who still believe that war is necessary. The human race will continue to destroy itself as long as it goes on trying to destroy the other man.

Where the Money Goes

CHAIRMAN HURLEY of the Chicago moving-picture commission says that the people of this great and glorious republic spend $2,000,000 every day to see the movies. It has been reckoned by financial experts that it costs the people of this country about $90,000,000 a day to live. That would make the spending of money for movies between 2 and 3 per cent.

But the people spend more than twice that for automobiles. The expert says the daily expenditure on automobiles is $4,500,000.

Now add the money spent on food. According to the same authority the people spend daily for food $33,000,000. That makes the ratio to movies 16 to 1.

Clothes is an item—$14,500,000 daily. Only seven times what the people spend for movies.

It would be interesting to know how much the people spend for books and newspapers and music and art.

And Religion is worth something. How much?

Wise Words

OF ALL the Englishmen who have represented Great Britain as Ambassadors to this country no one has been more generally respected and honored than former Ambassador Bryce. His book, "The American Commonwealth," is regarded as a masterpiece of clear understanding of the United States, and the historical perspective in that book is wonderful, especially when one takes into account the fact that an Englishman is writing of a political institution entirely different from the national organization into which he himself was born.

Lord Bryce therefore is a man to heed when he speaks on the question of disarmament, as he recently did in an address made in New York just before leaving for England. In that address he said very plainly and frankly:

"It has been sometimes supposed that armaments make for peace. They do not. They make for war. The existence of great armaments in a country fosters a large class who know how to make armaments and how to work them. It creates the desire to use the armaments which exist; it keeps the idea of war constantly before the mind of the people; it makes it seem a natural and probable thing and diminishes the horror with which the advent of war ought to be regarded."

—Associated Press Report.

These are very wise words from a very wise man, a great friend of America, and they ought to carry great weight, and they will. They are not the utterance of a so-called wild and visionary fanatic but the words of a great statesman who sees the thing as it is, and is not afraid to speak the truth.

Professional Amusements

OLD Man Ultimate Consumer was complaining about the expense of sport.

"Look at it—35,000 cranks will spend an average of $3 apiece a day for nine days to see a world series of baseball. A friend of mine is a member of a golf club near Chicago and he pays $750 a year for a golf club membership. I can't understand the craze for such professional amusements. Ten thousand persons lately followed the playing of golf experts on a course. And twenty thousand crowded the race course last week in our little town to see automobile races, where two men lost their lives and each one of the twenty thousand paid over a dollar apiece to see the deaths. At the college football game last Saturday over 15,000 rooters paid three dollars apiece to see the game. And among the students were hundreds whose dads are working their heads off to give their young hopefuls an education."

"Don't get excited," said the Man-Around-Town. "As long as the world stands people are going to spend their time and money on professional sport. We all need excitement to keep us from getting stale and commonplace."

"I wonder," says Old Man Ultimate Consumer.

Sunday School Failures

A QUESTIONNAIRE is being sent out from certain colleges and also from other institutions, asking this question:

"Why are the Sunday schools of the churches of America failing to give the children the right kind of religious education? What is the remedy?"

Our answer would be, They are not failing.

But the parents of the boys and girls who attend the Sunday schools of the churches are failing.

If all the parents of the children who go to the Sunday school were to attend, the churches could not hold the crowd.

If the parents all went it would indicate an interest in Sunday school education that now is almost entirely lacking.

Here is an absurdity. Fathers and mothers all over this country will spend from $500 to $1,500 a year to send a boy or girl through a college.

But ask the same fathers and mothers to give the church $100 a year to provide expert teachers and equipment for an up-to-date school for teaching their children religious truth, and they would be paralyzed.

Yet the Sunday schools are expected to compete with highly endowed colleges and universities and are called "failures" because with unpaid teachers and scanty equipment they do not give the boy and girl first-class religious education.

The parents who bring children into the world are responsible for the religious instruction of their own children before it is the duty of the church to give it.

Because the great majority of parents shirk this duty, the church has to take it up. And the children get about all the religious teaching they ever have, all free, from the church. Most parents never even thank the church for this free instruction.

But many of them are at the present moment criticizing the church because it "fails" to give ideal religious education.

Let the parents of boys and girls give as much for religious education as they are willing to give for secular. Let them put into the hands of the church the money for teaching and equipment that the colleges and universities get from them and see what would happen.

Until they are willing to do that or something like it they have no business to call the Sunday schools "failures."

We would like to see some questionnaires addressed to the fathers and mothers of America, something like this:

"Why are you such failures in giving needful religious instruction to your children? You are responsible for their training towards God. Why do you leave the responsibility to the church? What is the remedy?"

We are tired of all this wholesale criticism of the church and its organizations. Let some of the fault-finding fall on the family, where it belongs.

The World News of the Week

Union Chiefs Reject Labor Board Plan for Averting Railroad Strike

A WEEK of negotiations has failed to remove the threat of a nation-wide railroad strike; but, with the first big walk-out of the union men still a week distant as this issue of the Christian Herald goes to press, hopes of averting such a national calamity remain strong.

The week's efforts to effect a settlement centered in the proposal of the public group of the United States Railroad Labor Board, which suggested the following terms: Immediate reduction of freight rates to absorb the $430,000,000 savings effected through the wage cut made effective on July 1; immediate suspension of the strike order, pending negotiations; withdrawal by the roads of their plan to request an additional 10 per cent. cut in wages. Two conferences between the Labor Board and the brotherhood chiefs in Chicago proved futile, the union leaders declaring that they found nothing in this proposal to justify the cancellation of the strike order and that they could not postpone the strike.

They were frankly skeptical that the railroads could be prevailed upon to withhold their request for further wage cuts and stressed the importance of proposed changes in working conditions. Another objection was that the Esch-Cummins act provides no means for enforcing the board's decisions and they asserted sixteen or seventeen roads already had ignored rulings of the board, so that they see no end to what they consider encroachments on their rights.

Following the rejection of this proposal for a settlement the Labor Board issued orders assuming jurisdiction in the crisis and calling on the union leaders and the railroad executives to attend hearings to open October 26 in Chicago. It also directed both parties to the dispute to maintain the status quo until hearings should have been finished and its decision announced, which means in effect that the employees are forbidden to strike on October 30, since the Board's decision will not be ready by that date. In taking this action, the Board had the assurance of backing by President Harding and every agency of the government.

Officials of several other railroad unions which were expected to go on strike at the same time as the "Big Five" unions have refused to authorize a walk-out at present, so that the total membership of the unions for which strike orders had been issued stood at a little more than 400,000 instead of upwards of 2,000,000 as would have been the case had all railroad unions joined with them. Should the 400,000 go out, however, a serious tie-up of the nation's transportation would result.

Senate Ratifies Peace Treaty

WITH Democrats supplying the decisive votes, the Senate has ratified the treaties negotiated by the Harding administration to end the war with Germany, Austria and Hungary. The German treaty, the first to be acted on, was carried by a vote of 66 to 20, eight more than the required two-thirds majority and a larger margin than Republican leaders had been anticipating. Fourteen Democrats, among them Senator Underwood, the minority leader, joined with the Republicans in support of the treaty, and two other Democrats were paired in favor of ratification. Two Republicans, Senators Borah and La Follette, voted against the treaty and another, Senator Norris, was paired against it.

On the Austrian treaty the vote was the same as on the German pact, while the Hungarian treaty was ratified by a vote of 66 to 17. Little attention was paid to these treaties in the debate, the contending forces centering their oratory on the German pact. The Wilson leaders in the Senate and others who favored the Versailles Treaty and the League of Nations or nothing continued their fight to the end; and, strangely enough, were aligned on the final vote fore caused gratification. The difficult subject of immigration, officials stated, would not be discussed at the conference, since both the American and the Japanese governments consider it a domestic question. Formal announcement of the results of the informal exchanges among the Powers was withheld in accordance with diplomatic courtesy.

Important members of the foreign delegations have been arriving in the United States and have received hearty welcomes in New York, but the main figures in Conference will not come until the eve of its opening.

Bomb Damages Herrick Home

A BOMB attempt on the life of Myron T. Herrick, the American Ambassador to France, resulted in an explosion which wrecked two rooms of his Paris home while he was only a few feet distant, but he and the members of his family fortunately escaped injury. His valet, a former soldier who had opened the package containing the explosive and tossed it into an adjoining room when he heard a warning whirr, was injured slightly. The package had been sent the Embassy by mail and excited no suspicions, so that it was merely by chance that Mr. Herrick himself did not open it.

The Paris police, who at once began an intensive search for the criminals, believed the bomb to be the work of French Communists who for two weeks had been conducting a campaign against the execution of two Italians, Sacco and Vanzetti, convicted in Massachusetts of murdering two men in connection with a payroll robbery. The case had passed virtually unnoticed in the United States, but had caused widespread agitation among radicals abroad. Mr. Herrick had received scores of threatening letters and telegrams regarding the case, and "Red" newspapers in Paris made it the occasion for bitter attacks on the "capitalist régime" in America. Ambassador Harvey in London also has received threatening letters and the British authorities took steps to forestall an attempt on his life. In Italy the case has excited the radical elements and in a recent hostile demonstration of extremists before the American Embassy in Rome the police made a hundred arrests before the crowd was dispersed.

Britain's Unemployment Program

PREMIER Lloyd George, in outlining before the House of Commons the British government's program with regard to unemployment and trade, took a broad international view which is deserving of consideration in this country. Attributing the country's economic crisis which has brought the number of unemployed up to 1,750,000 to one thing—the war—he declared peace and a good understanding among nations to be vital, since the commerce on which prosperity is dependent can not be resumed in an atmosphere of hostility.

It is obvious, he said, that neither the exporter nor the importer could build upon "an acrobatic basis of exchange," and he therefore proposed a plan to stimulate international trade by having the government assume part of the risks. It will raise guarantees of interest on loans to traders to 100 per cent., with the maximum for each firm to be fixed by an advisory committee—a plan which means government underwriting of the great business interests.

The government proposes to guarantee the interest on loans to the amount of £25,000,000 to be raised for purposes of carrying out capital undertakings providing employment or for the purchase

BIG RAILROAD EXECUTIVES WHO LEAD THE FIGHT AGAINST THE UNIONS

In this group, snapped at the entrance to the White House at a recent conference with the President, are the executives of America's greatest railroads. The railroad executives and the union leaders have been summoned to Railroad Labor Board hearings in Chicago in a new effort to prevent a strike with those who had most bitterly opposed the Versailles compact. Senators Borah and Reed, heading the fight against ratification, denounced the German treaty as an instrument so framed as to bring America into the League at some future date, and Senator Borah expressed the conviction that the Harding administration was moving in that direction. Senator Reed twice offered amendments designed to eliminate the Versailles treaty from the German pact but lost overwhelmingly, and all other attempts at amendments were defeated easily.

Conference Agenda Approved

THE agenda for the coming Washington conference has been subject to only one change or addition—and that was the inclusion of the subject of Pacific electrical communications at the instance of the United States—since it was submitted by Secretary Hughes several weeks ago to the governments invited to participate. All the nations except China accepted it subject only to such innovations as the developments of the conference may suggest. China, it was said, proposed topics not included in the agenda, but the nature of these has not been disclosed.

The Japanese ambassador in Washington, Baron Shidehara, presented a memorandum accompanied by verbal observations, in which his government accepted the agenda as a whole, stating at the same time Japan's views regarding it. It had been anticipated that Japan might seek important changes in the list of topics for discussion and Tokio's acceptance there-

The Things Before and Things Behind

TEXT—Phil. 3:13, 14. "This one thing I do forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark, for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus."

THIS is the speech of an old man, and that is the amazing novelty of it. It is an inspiring vision to see men piling up their years, and yet putting fresh fuel upon their enthusiasms, and maintaining a more fervent glow than ever. There is something very kindling in the sight of men who preserve a militant ardor of soul, and who ride forth in old age to slay dragons as bravely and as cheerily, and with as much knightly buoyancy and song, as in the days of their prime. They march forth as to the beat of drums, and the streets of old age are gay with advancing banners. This man Paul keeps wonderful fires of enthusiasm. There is no shortage of fuel. His fires burn as rapturously at fifty as they did at twenty-five. Their glow is as intense at the end of his days as it was in the beginning. It is a great thing, when your own fires are burning low, to get near to the Apostle Paul. His fervor has a strange power of transmitting itself to others, and he shares his heat with those who join his fellowship.

When he writes the words of my text, he is nearing the end of his days. He is in captivity at Rome. It would seem as though his enemies have a right to shout, for they appear to be triumphant. They have broken up his life. They have checked his missionary crusades. He can no longer go about as he pleases, trudging through land after land, carrying the sacred flame of his evangel. He is awaiting trial at Rome. He is to appear before Cæsar, but the Cæsar is the infamous Nero, and the gates of hope are not ajar in that direction. The curfew seems to toll the knell of parting day. How fares it with him now?

Well, how is it with people when they grow older? They are apt to slacken their speed. They are apt to become garrulous, and their garrulousness is inclined to be occupied with famous things which have been, but which will be no more. Old people usually indulge in retrospect and reminiscence. They issue books of recollections, but they unfold no fine programs. They fight old battles over again in words. They shoulder their crutch and show how fields were won. The past becomes their kingdom, and it imprisons them and their soul moves within its boundaries. How then is it with this man who is imprisoned at Rome? Listen to him: "Forgetting those things which are behind!" That is the very opposite posture to that at which we have been looking. It is not the pose of recollection and reminiscence. It is the pose of the forward mind, gazing into futurity with eager, searching eyes. "Reaching forth to the things which are before, I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." This man's spirit is a cordial at which any downhearted soul may drink and go on his way refreshed and rejoicing.

NOW let us try to turn this man's triumph-song into counsel for ourselves. "Forgetting the things which are behind." What is that but a trumpet-call bidding us refuse to allow the past to become our tyrant? Let us get the force of that word "forgetting." It means to lose out of mind, to neglect, to leave disregarded, to say little or nothing about a thing. Refuse to give the past recognition when it comes to you as a master and would subdue you as its slave. Reject the tyranny!

The past can stretch out a hand and grip the present with a throttling grasp. We talk about the "dead hand" of the past. And the dead hand is not an impotent hand, lying harmlessly upon us; it is cold, and chilling, and deadly, and deadening. It can lie upon us with a touch of blight, and everything withers before it. The past can be the minister of paralysis. And the Apostle calls us to defy the dead hand and to reject its tyranny. What does he mean? What are these things which are behind, and from whose tyranny we can escape?

Well, first of all, there are the sinful things of the past, and we can refuse to permit their deadening tyranny and dominion. Past sin can hold us in present enslavement. Sin can come from a far-off yesterday and proudly claim its inheritance today. For mark how sin works. Every sin we commit stakes out its own claim in the kingdom of our life. Every sin exercises some power of dominion over our habits. Every time we sin, we enter into a larger servitude. Sin is the enemy of our freedom. There is nothing so clutching, nothing so unescapable as the dead hand of an old sin. Now, Paul had these sins in past days; but he refused their tyranny, and he was brought into a condition where he could forget the things which are behind.

HOW did he do it? There is only one way to do it and that is Christ's way. The way to meet the imperious tyranny of a sinful past is to hand it over to Christ. Only Christ can deal with sin-born tyrannies. And He can destroy the deepest and the harshest servitude. That is what He came to do. "He shall be called Jesus, for He shall save His people from their sin." And that most surely includes the sins of yesterday, the dragons and the monsters which are born and bred in other days, and which have fattened and grown strong with the disobedience of the years. And Paul had handed over his past to the Saviour, and the Saviour had dealt with it. "Where sin abounded, grace doth much more abound." Such was the transformation wrought by the Lord. Paul looked back upon his past and it seemed to abound in sin; and then in Christ Jesus he looked again and it seemed to abound in grace.

a man begins to survey his moral and spiritual attainments, and to do so with satisfaction, the satisfaction easily degenerates into self-conceit. He begins to parade his virtues. He puts them into a window of publicity, and he labels them with his own name. And, like all goods exposed in a shop-window, they begin to soil and to fade. The shady side of Pharisaism is just this public display of moral attainments. "I thank Thee that I am not as other men are, extortionists, unjust, adulterers, or even as this poor publican. I fast twice in the week. I give tithes of all that I possess." This man's successes are holding him in bonds. His very attainments have become his chains. And that is ever so when we begin to expose our virtues in spectacular display. Fondled virtues wrap themselves around us with the soft constraints of silken cords. It is well to remember that a man can be hanged with a rope that is woven of silk. Our virtues can become our fetters.

And so when Paul refuses the tyranny of the past, he refuses the tyranny of its triumphs. He denied the right of past successes to impose a boundary, and thereby limit or paralyze the forward movements of his soul. He forgets the things which are behind. And what is his second counsel? It relates to "The things which are before." And what does that mean but that we are to explore the horizon for fresh possibilities of new conquests? It proclaims the wholeness of the forward-looking mind. We are to explore the horizon for new ventures, for new attainments, for new abilities in divine fellowship, for new capacities of life and service.

BUT now we must see to it that the exploration is thorough and efficient. It is a good thing—indeed it is the only wise thing—to seek some expert in exploration, to look through the eyes of some noble seer, and scan the horizon in his fellowship. It is a wonderful thing to look through the eyes of John Ruskin upon a rain cloud which hangs low and ragged upon the horizon. How the gloom opens out into an apocalypse. And it is equally wonderful to scan the spiritual horizon through the eyes of some one who is a master in the things of grace.

For instance, we can use the eyes of the Apostle Paul. What does he see on the horizon which is concerned for thee and me? Let me read through his letters and see what he is looking at, and then claim it as part of my own inheritance. Or let me look through the eyes of John, the seer whose eyes are made quiet by the power of harmony and the deep power of joy. But pre-eminently let us look through the eyes of Christ.

Let us go carefully through all He has to say about us, and note the things that are before. What does He want me to be, what is the purpose of His grace? What has He in store for me? What range of fellowship, what depth of discernment, what height of holiness, what wealth of freedom, what capacity of service? Let me explore the horizon and let me fill my eyes with contemplation of the glory.

His final counsel is this: "Reaching forth unto those things which are before." And what is this but an urgent appeal to use athletic vigor in undertaking new crusades. Let us mark the strenuousness of the words "reaching forth." It is full of vigor. It means to stretch to the uttermost. It is the figure of a runner with the whole bias of his body stretched out toward the goal. That is to be my mood, and my attitude in regard to the things which gleam upon the horizon of my soul. A word like this makes me ashamed of the slackness of my own spiritual endeavor.

For how little of the athlete there is about my running! How little of stretch there is in my posture! How much playing with the thing and how much ease!

THE trouble is we give our strength to our business, and we give our weakness to the Lord. We give our strength to our work, and we give our weakness to our worship. We lay hold of money with both hands, but we touch the Lord with a finger. And yet we are called upon to be athletes in our Father's business.

And this therefore should be our daily vow of consecration—'O God, I will serve Thee with my strength, I will offer Thee the strenuousness of an athletic life. With all my might I will stretch out to the things which are before. By Thy grace I will win the inheritance which shines on the distant horizon. By Thy grace I will!'

And in the carrying out of that covenant, such a man will move from grace to grace, and from strength to strength, and from glory to glory.

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited.

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Crown Him Lord of All," "Jesus Shall Reign Where'er the Sun."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—James 3 Chap. Verses 4 to 13. "Governing the Tongue."

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation (See page 807, first column.)

Sermon—"THE THINGS BEHIND AND THE THINGS BEFORE"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Just as I am, without one Plea," or "Sweet Hour of Prayer."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon to be read aloud.

Master of All, may our service today teach us to curb our passions that minister to our lower life, help us to overcome the wrong by the prevailing power of Thy might, reveal to us Thy way and make us to be eager to make it ours, and fill our souls with everlasting faith in the everlasting life. We ask it in Jesus' name. AMEN.

The wilderness had been changed into a garden; and the black country unveiled the wonderful love of God.

And in this way we too can refuse to acknowledge the dominion of sin. We can reject its tyranny over our life. Humbly and penitently we can hand it over to the Saviour, and we need not worry about it any more. Refuse to accept the imperiousness of sin, and if in moments of depression it rise against you, quietly meet it with the word, "Christ has died," and it will leave you like some dark bird of the night, flying away before the sweet clear light of the dawn.

BUT there are other things of the past whose tyranny we must reject. We must refuse to allow the spiritual triumphs of the past to hold us in dominion. Can our triumphs be our tyrants? Yes, indeed they can. Can some spiritual conquest of last year put forth a hand upon today and hold me in bonds? Yes, indeed it can. We can be imprisoned by our defeats, but we can also be imprisoned by our conquests. A success may conduce a premature satisfaction, it can incline us to rest and be thankful. We can stay our journey when we are only half way up the hill and we can go to sleep. A spiritual triumph may induce perilous contentment, and in that contentment we may abate our ardor and slacken our speed. And so the good becomes the enemy of the better, and the better becomes the enemy of the best. We pat ourselves on the back, and we say "good," and the good dims our eyes to the lure of the excellent. We go into some inn or hostel of satisfaction, and so we end our journey, and we fall asleep.

Now, all this is the creator of Pharisaism. When

The "Far Country"

SUNDAY. Luke 15:14. "He took his journey into a far country." This journeying into the far country is usually interpreted as one of prodigality, and even one of profligacy. Here is a young fellow eaten up with vice. He has lapsed into degeneracy. In the most fearful way he has become depraved. He is bankrupt in money and in character. He has sunk almost beyond recognition. We think of his very garments as the symbols of his shame. His garments are torn and defiled. He is in rags, and he is herding with the swine. He is a "waster" of the lowest type. He has gone a long, long way! He is in the far country.

That is how we commonly think of a prodigal who has wandered away from home. But now let me introduce a sentence of St. Augustine's which immeasurably broadens our conception—"The far country is forgetfulness of God." That is a revolutionary way of describing the vagrancy. All the stage setting of our familiar conception is gone. There is no swinish carnality. All is outwardly decent, and yet there is a forgetfulness which is the certain proof of spiritual estrangement. Here is a man who has forgotten God, and, whatever may be his material condition, he is in the far country, far away from home.

And surely this is the universal teaching of the Word of God. There is no more awful word in the scriptures than just this word "forget." It expresses the quintessence of disunion. It marks the culmination of spiritual tragedy. It suggests the uttermost poignancy of the pain of abandonment. Whenever it appears, in any book of the scriptures, it seems to record the climax, the very maturity of alienation. Here is an example from Deuteronomy: "Thou hast forgotten God who formed thee!" Here is another from Jeremiah: "My people have forgotten Me!" That cry is repeated again and again. Here is another from Ezekiel: "Thou hast forgotten Me!" Here is still another from Hosea: "Israel hath forgotten his Maker!" These are only a little handful from a great number. And to all these accusations must be added an equal number of warnings. "Be-ware, lest thou forget the Lord thy God." There is agony in the words. Forgetfulness is outrage and indignity at their worst. When we forget God we are a long way astray. The far country is the land of forgetfulness.

And when we think about it, is not this true of our purely human relationships, the relationship of man with man? Is there any estrangement worse than this—to be just forgotten?

And God can be absent from our consciousness, and never be missed. We can forget Him for a whole day, and He is never missed. We can forget Him for a whole week, for a whole year—nay, for the larger part of a life, and there is no tragic feeling that something is missing from our ways. Surely, in such forgetfulness we are in the far country! In one of his private devotions, one of those confessions of sin which are so fearfully vital that one feels that if the sentences were broken they would drip blood, Lancelot Andrews uses these words—"I have neglected Thee, O Lord!" It is the awaking cry of a soul which has been in the land of forgetfulness, and the cry is a sign that he is coming back home.

Yes, for that is the other side of all this. When we begin to remember God, we are looking towards home: nay, we are taking the first steps on our return. It may be that the remembrance will fill us with pain, and with sore penitence, and even remorse. "I remembered God, and was troubled!" So said one soul, as he turned again home. But the very trouble is a sign of revival. It is like the aching pain of lost "feeling" returning to hands that have been benumbed with cold. The hands ache, but it means a restored circulation. And when we remember God, communion is being re-established. We are on the way home: we are leaving the far country behind.

My Mother

MONDAY. Psa. 92:14. "Thou shalt still bring forth fruit." I am thinking of an Elect Lady who sat in her invalid chair at ninety-three, with veiled eyes and palsied hands; but superannuated? Oh, no! I hear her now, singing in a quavering voice.

"On Jordan's rugged banks I stand,
And cast a wishful eye
To Canaan's fair and happy land,
Where my possessions lie.
O the transporting, rapturous scene,
That rises to my sight!
Sweet fields arrayed in living green
And rivers of delight!"

By the sweet influence of her overcoming faith and patience she was unconsciously bringing forth fruit in her old age. It was more than thirty years ago that she turned the bend in the road; but many a time, climbing the pulpit stairs, I have felt her dear hand on my shoulder and heard her saying just as she used to, "My son, the Lord be with you."

What a heritage! She being dead yet speaketh. I wonder was this in the mind of the Master when He said, "He that liveth and believeth on me shall never die"?

D. J. B.

Faith in Each Other

TUESDAY. Matt. 6:9. "Our Father which art in heaven." It is upon the social implications of the Master's teaching that Christian society must be built. We cannot join with our fellow Christians around the world in the Lord's Prayer, and then lightly consider our brother's worth. The great ideal of brotherhood must rest back ultimately on fatherhood. Each time we voice the great prayer the dignity of humanity should be borne in upon our hearts.

Recently I was told of a minister of whom one of his officers said, "It requires all of Mr. A's time to explain his mistakes." Of course such a statement is a sad commentary upon the ability of the minister, but it is an equally sad commentary upon the Christianity of his people, that it was necessary for the preacher to explain his honest mistakes. There is some truth in the thing that we have been told so often, that it does no good to apologize, that our friends do not need the explanation and our enemies will not believe it. Surely we do need among Christian workers greater faith in each other.

Many times I have watched the lead and zinc miners as they worked with sledge and steel. They work largely in pairs, one man holding the steel and the other striking. Their skill is nothing less than marvelous, men striking with a full swing where a few inches to one side or the other would mean mutilation if not death to the man holding the steel. It was fascinating to see them work, many times in almost impossible positions. One day I was watching two very capable miners at work, when, for some reason, the stroke did not fall true and the hand of the man holding the steel was badly mangled. To my amazement not a word was spoken. In silence the men climbed down from the platform and the wound was roughly dressed. All the time we were wrapping up the hand not a word passed between the men. I said nothing, though the procedure interested me greatly. When opportunity came I told the ground boss of the occurrence, and the fact that there had been no explanation and no apology. The man turned to me and said: "If ever you hurt a man in the mine, never apologize. If you do, it will probably mean a fight, for he will then think that it was intentional." The custom seems to me to be an excellent one. And what fine confidence it does show! Church work would be much more enjoyable and would accomplish more for Him if we had just a little more of that confidence in the integrity of purpose of each other.

That faith in each other must come from the Spirit of Christ in our hearts, and from the recognition of the worth of each man based on our common heritage.

The Best Is Yet to Be

WEDNESDAY. James 1:4. "Let patience have her perfect work." If ever we are tempted to think of patience as a mark of weakness, it may help us to remember that Nature is the most patient of forces. All the normal processes of nature are slow. The things which Nature does swiftly are anomalies and they are generally disasters. The Bible has always told us of the patience of God. Think of the ages it required to develop a race of people capable of receiving the revelation of God's unity and spirituality.

Years ago, a man in the Northwest developed a passion to improve the quality of wheat. He began picking out his seed wheat grain by grain, and within a single generation, produced a variety of more vigorous wheat, wheat that resists both heat and cold better than the old varieties, and matures from ten days to two weeks earlier. This is a type of patience, heroic, unconquerable.

God began His process of separation with Abraham. For two thousand years He picked out his human seed until, when Jesus came, there were a few could receive the revelation, a few who responded to His appeal. (Paul was of that "picked" race and of the "picked" tribe of that race.) God is very patient in His process of lifting humanity. He is not through with us yet. His process is incomplete. A better humanity is yet to be. God's patience and ours must work together.

Faith First

THURSDAY. II. Tim. 1:10. "Who hath abolished death, and hath brought life and immortality to life through the Gospel." The fact of immortality does not rest for its proof upon human reason, logic, departed spirits or the discoveries of science. Neither does the fact of the existence of God. The Bible assumes these greatest truths as being above proof. Faith, the sister of reason, accepts the inspired statement of the Holy Scriptures. Because Christ lived, we shall live also. He says, "Fear not; I am He that was dead, and behold I am alive forevermore." Our Lord's life, words, death and resurrection have brought life immortal to light in the Gospel.

We are to believe His words, His works. Himself, if we would know the truth divine. He says, "I go to prepare a place for you, that where I am, there ye may be also. If it were not so, I would have told you." If these words are unworthy of belief, creation is a magnificent ruin, life a mockery, hope a despair, fatherhood a failure. Christ sealed His testimony with His blood; He illustrated immortality by His rising and His ascension into heaven, and by His spirit coming to Pentecost, and by His drawing all mankind unto Him for a score of centuries.

When Jesus finished His mission, He prayed, "Let Me go to the glory I had with the Father, at Home, before the world was." Is not home, home, the cry throughout the universe, the last words of the dying saints? There is no deep, dark river of death since Jesus bridged the stream; what seems death is only transition, crossing over into eternal life. There we will begin a new journey that will never end.

Preacher and Hearer

FRIDAY. John 14:17. "Even the Spirit of Truth; whom the world cannot receive." We take blame to ourselves for our failure to present the truth with an all consuming and convincing zeal. But this does not relieve the responsibility of the hearer for any indifference to spiritual things. O Spirit of God, baptize us preachers with fire and power! Send us to our pulpits, as Moses went to the Egyptian court, straight from the vision of the burning bush with the message "I-am-that-I-am hath sent me." Then give our hearers the hearing ear and the understanding heart.

At the close of a recent sermon by an evangelist who is sometimes criticized for his use of the vernacular, he paused in an attitude of utter exhaustion, and uttered the following singular prayer: "My Lord Jesus, I have put in my best lies for You, and I can do no more. You'd think everybody would bow down in repentance and come running to You. But they won't. Some of them will, but more will go away and forget all about it. And if they don't look out, they will sleep on till the last trumpet sounds. You must awake them, Lord! It's up to You. Show them that they are sinners and on the way to hell. I can't do any more. Amen." Whatever we may think about the familiarity of that prayer, we are bound to confess that there was a world of truth in it.

Exchange and Example

SATURDAY. Col. 4:16. "And when this epistle is read among you, cause that it be read also in the Church of the Laodiceans, and that ye likewise read the epistle from Laodicea." If any good thing comes your way, pass it along. If you have an idea, hand it down. If you have read a good book recommend it. If you have heard a good sermon tell it. If you know of any good thing tell others. If you know of failure, write it on the sands of the seashore. If you know of any virtue, engrave it on granite. If you have been blessed, be a blessing.

No one is so impoverished that he cannot give something of help and inspiration to the social fabric in which he finds himself. The man next door needs me, and I need the man next door. The Church needs both of us and we need the Church. Labor needs capital and capital needs labor. The listener wants good preaching and the preacher wants good listeners. The world is dependent. The human race is one family. Studying a bigger map and having a world-wide vision, horizons shall recede and merge into the broad sky of the Kingdom of God.

We are looking and praying and toiling for that Kingdom. But before God can operate man must co-operate. "The greatest word of the next one hundred years will be 'together.'" Isaiah has given us the ideal picture: "They helped every one his neighbor, and every one said to his brother, Be of good courage." The key to the realization of this picture is Christian missions. "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel."

SAFETY ALWAYS—Deceleration also is much needed both on the city boulevard and country road alike. The Apperson comes to a standstill from 40 miles in 40 yards—in 4 seconds.

EASY TURNING RADIUS—You can turn an Apperson with its 130-inch wheel-base around in 38 $\frac{1}{4}$  feet. This means you can get in and out from curbs easily and can turn nicely in the average city street.

5

HIGH SPEED—You can travel as fast as road conditions will permit in an Apperson—and the car rides easily and smoothly without sidesway or vibration.

3

INSTANT PICKUP—In the traffic of the cities you need acceleration. The Apperson glides from 1 to 40 miles in 20 seconds.

6

SLOW SPEED—You can drive an Apperson at walking pace—in high. This helps in traffic and it does the work quietly and smoothly.

13

SMOOTHNESS OF OPERATION—A smooth liquid flow of power is provided for the Apperson. There are no "rough spots." The controls are all within easy reach and simply operated as well.

Apartment Hunting

EVERY once in a while we city-dwellers go apartment hunting. It isn't a habit with us, nor yet an attempt at finding amusement. It isn't even a seeking after variety. It's usually a matter of sheer necessity that takes us out on a search for a new home. For city rents have a way of sky-rocketing in the direction of the clouds—and city salaries don't often follow in their lead. And when rents sky-rocket—and salaries don't—it is often a good plan to move!

The city isn't like the country, in the matter of homes. It isn't like the wide, sparsely settled places, where every family owns a comfortable farmhouse and a roomy barn. Neither is the city like the small villages and towns where thrifty young couples buy neat shingle and stucco cottages, on the instalment plan. The city is a crowded place of tall buildings that stand grimly side by side—tall buildings that are honey-combed with small rooms. And some of these small rooms are linked together into suites of one, or two, or three. And these suites of rooms are charitably called apartments. And no matter how small they are or how crowded or how inconvenient or how expensive, there's always somebody who will live in them—live in them gladly.

When I first came to the city to live I had quite lofty ideas on the subject of apartments. I would insist upon elevators, I thought, and sunshine in every room, and parquet floors, and flower gardens. But after I had spent some time apartment-hunting I found that my ideas had undergone a mighty change. I found that I was inclined to accept fresh air with a deep thanksgiving—and to forget my demands in the matter of sunshine. I found that moderately clean, moderately new floors would do; that parquet wasn't necessary. And as for flower gardens—I discovered that a window-box is as far as the average city-dweller gets—when said city-dweller has garden ambitions!

I HAD always built an ideal of home around an ideal of beauty—sheer, appealing beauty. But, after my first dose (it can be called nothing else!) of apartment hunting, my ideals dwindled away. And I found myself saying, as I viewed a prospective abode:

"Perhaps I can do something with this!" Not—"How very suitable this is!" I found myself considering the possibilities rather than the advantages. I found myself looking for comfort and convenience rather than for mere surface prettiness. I found that the newest, shiniest rooms often lacked such things as adequate heat, and wash-tubs, and even cook stoves.

"Almost everybody goes to restaurants, now," more than one agent told me; "hardly anybody gets their own meals at home." So few people care to cook that we've done away with kitchens!

And so I learned—through my rather bitter experience—to look kindly upon neutral-toned walls. And to plan cretonne hangings and vases and sofa cushions that would bring light to shadowy corners. And to nail up shelves in empty spaces, and to create makeshift wardrobes, and miniature kitchenettes. And I discovered that it was oftenest the plain but practical apartment that I took—rather than the flimsy, beautiful one. For an apartment that is only practical can sometimes be made beautiful, but an apartment that is only beautiful often-times can not—by any amount of work or worry—be made practical!

One Looks for More Than Beauty in a Prospective Home

Did you ever hear a boy say—as I did, once—that the prettiest girl at a party seldom makes the best wife? Did you ever hear a man or a woman remark that beauty is only skin deep and that a friend should be valued for sterling worth rather than for decorative qualities? Have you ever chosen a gown or a suit for its strength of fabric, passing by, as you did so, a flimsy bolt of goods with a pleasing color and sheen? Because the principle involved, in all three cases, is the same principle that is involved when one is searching for an apartment.

APARTMENTS, and clothes and friends and husbands and wives—the same rule applies to them all! It isn't surface charm, alone, that counts—it's the possibilities and the worth and the wearing qualities that really matter!

Of course, surface charm can't really be ignored. Appealing prettiness and marvelous beauty can not be passed by. It's only that they must be weighed, in any matter that needs a decision, with the more necessary things.

An apartment can be both attractive and convenient at the same time. It

IT DOESN'T matter how small it is, Or how dim it is, or how plain it is; It doesn't matter if all it is,

Is a little room or two— The walls may be drab—and plain, a bit, And the chairs and tables may not quite fit But as long as it's ours, what we call it is A HOME, for me and for you!

For it doesn't matter how thin the purse, Or how troubles come (oh, things might be worse!) When all the love that world can hold—

May live in a room or two, Things may be crowded of course, and tight, And the hearth fire may be hard to light, But how can even a room be cold When it's home, for me and for you?

can be. Of course it isn't, often, unless one has an all-reaching and elastic purse. And a pretty girl is often as splendid and sincere as her less attractive sisters. And a friend can be good and true without being hard to look at. And I have had dresses that were mighty charming as to color—and that wore like the proverbial iron.

I'm not trying to tell you—friends of mine—that beautiful things aren't good things! You know me too well to suspect me of advocating only ugliness and plainness. But I'm trying to impress upon your minds—as it's been impressed upon my mind—that beauty, to be worth while, must be beauty—plus. It must be beauty plus usefulness and convenience.

Perhaps you wonder why I've been talking so hard about apartments. Perhaps you wonder why apartments are so much in my mind this week. It's because—and this is ever so true—I've just finished apartment hunting. It's because, for months, I've been searching for a place in which a home might be made.

I found it, today. It's in the back of a building and it hasn't any view. And the closets aren't all that they should be and it's apt to be just a shade dark. And it's inclined to cost more than it should—although it's less ridiculously expensive than any of the other apartments that I've looked at.

For in the city all dwelling places are so expensive that one cannot help speculating on where the folk who earn what is called "a mere living wage" can possibly live. And one cannot help wondering if the really poor people do live!

But it has a stove that's large enough to cook on—and that has a real oven! And the hall boy says that the water is always hot. And there's a telephone and a fireplace—a fireplace that really burns, that will be fine for pop-corn making on cold winter evenings. And I have a certain print of a wee house with a red roof and a green background of trees that I'll hang where there isn't any window.

And I'll pretend, oh, ever so hard, that it's a view!

How Plain Anne Found a Way to be Pretty—

and a way to have pretty clothes, too!

IT WAS really quite a shame, you know, that Anne couldn't have the right kind of clothes to wear. She was just a simple little miss, thrilled with the thousand longings of youth, dreaming of laughter and beauty—and of love. But somehow she was just plain. She was the type of girl who needed pretty, frilly, dainty things to wear—a blue frock with tiny ruffles to do justice to the blue in her eyes, or a gay little dress of pink or red to harmonize with her hair.

But it wasn't her fault that she never had anything to wear except horrid gingham and calicoes. Folks called her "Plain Anne"—but they didn't know of the golden dreams that surged unceasingly within that curly brown head. Nor did they know of the heartache when those dreams were shattered.

Even now, while the others were at the hay festival, Anne sat in her little room beneath the gables and dreamed. She dreamed on while the stars tried to lure her with their mischievous twinklings, and while the big yellow moon frowned down upon her with the mock worldliness of his many centuries. Somewhere a cowbell began to tinkle and was lost in the melody of church chimes. All the world seemed so sweet and kind and happy—but she was alone, always alone!

"It isn't fair!" she told herself bitterly as out of the distance came a shout of laughter from the merry-makers. "It isn't right!" Why wasn't she with them? Why didn't folks ever invite her anywhere? Why didn't she ever go to picnics and parties like other girls? It wasn't her fault that she wasn't pretty. It wasn't her fault that she didn't have gay little frocks and becoming little hats. She fell asleep that night with a funny little pain somewhere inside—and she dreamed that everything had changed—that she was tall and slender and pretty with a wardrobe full of beautiful things to wear!

When Darkness Precedes Dawn

Then, one wonderful day, Bob came to town. There was a big reception, and everyone was at the station to greet him—for wasn't Bob the son of old Bill Jenkins who had done so much for the folks way back when they had the blizzard? Even Anne was there, and once when she caught Bob's eye as he stood on the platform making a speech to the welcoming crowd, she blushed and felt strangely warm. But Bob did not glance that way again. . . .

In the days that followed, Anne felt more keenly than ever her unattractiveness. She became self-conscious, timid. She couldn't help it—her clothes made her so. How could anyone feel happy and at ease in a faded old dress that didn't fit at all?

Bob and Helen Randolph became fast friends from the very first. Helen was quite pretty, you see, and somehow her clothes always seemed to be made for just her. Anne used to watch them as they passed by her home on the way to a party or to the theater. And secretly she used to picture herself in Helen's place, wearing attractive clothes, walking down Main Street with Bob, gloriously and proudly happy for the first time in her life!

It was just about this time that Mrs. Hampton came from the city with her little daughter to live at Anne's home. She was going to open a smart dress shop in town. She had beautiful clothes—soft, shimmering dresses of silk and crisp little affairs of organdie and taffeta. She had exquisite underthings, so dainty and sheer that Anne was almost afraid to touch them. And her little girl had dresses such as no other little girl in town had—smart, well-made, colorful little frocks that made her look like a little fairy. Oh, how Anne longed for just such pretty things as these!

Mrs. Hampton saw—and understood. Women have a way of understanding one another, you know. "Why don't you make some pretty things for yourself?" she asked one morning. "I make clothes! Why, I never sewed a stitch in my life," Anne answered, crimsoning to think that even strangers could see at once that she was "plain." "Neither did I," the other laughed, "until just six months ago when I registered for one of the most remarkable courses in home clothes-making you ever heard about. Now I've finished that Course and I've come here to open a dress shop and make lots of money."

Anne glanced at the open trunk with its mysterious depths of lace and ribbon, its shimmering folds of satin and velvet, its gleam of rich, deep colors. "You—made—those—things?" she asked slowly. Mrs. Hampton nodded. There was a moment of silence—and then with an impulsive little sob of pure joy Anne grasped the stranger's hand and whispered, "Show me how!"

A Dream Come True at Last

That was the beginning. By the end of that week, Anne was enrolled officially as a member of the School of Modern Dress and Mrs. Hampton was busily launched on the selection of interior decorations for her new shop. If she hadn't been so busy, perhaps she would have helped Anne—but after all, the course was so ridiculously easy to follow.

Before two weeks had passed, Anne found out just why she hadn't been attractive—the course told her. She found out that folks didn't have to be pretty to be attractive, and that it was really her unbecoming clothes that made her appear "plain." Why, she was actually wearing the kind of clothes that concealed all her "good points" and revealed the "bad points!" Here was a lesson that told her exactly what colors were most becoming to her, what style dresses and blouses she should wear, how to combine colors and lines so that the dress would make her look positively pretty!

There followed many busy months in which every spare minute was devoted to "the course." Anne found it quite fascinating to study stitches and hems and seams, embroidery and tucking and ruffling. All the methods taught in the course were the newest, quickest and most improved—and she was as thrilled as a child with a new toy when she watched ten yards of material rapidly transformed into tucks or ruffles or plaits in only ten minutes. Why, it would take hours to do it by hand! And Anne found that even the most exquisite braided designs could be made in this new rapid method. Before she realized it, she had learned the modern, up-to-the-minute, simplified way of transforming lifeless material into the most exquisite blouses and dresses and underthings she ever owned! In less than a third the time she had thought possible! For only the small expense of what the materials alone cost!

It didn't take long then before people began to remark how pretty Plain Anne was becoming. They didn't know that the new little brown frock had a lot to do with it—that the little orange blouse she wore with the neat black skirt was exactly the color and style that were most becoming to her. They noticed only the bright new light in her eyes, and the new poise and grace she had suddenly acquired. And they weren't a bit surprised when Bob began to profess a sudden and keen interest in the girl who had been known as Plain Anne.

The Beginning of a New Story

It's really remarkable what a difference clothes can make. Anne's whole life seemed to be changed. The evening she wore her new satin dress, for instance, Bob told her how pretty she looked—she, pretty! And then at Helen's party, when she wore a net dress with a tiny lace bodice and huge pink sash, even Mrs. Hampton paused to admire. After the party there was a long walk in the moonlight with Bob, and a strange new feeling of complete peace—of complete happiness. It seemed, somehow, as though there were nothing left in all the world to wish for.

Well, Plain Anne is plain no longer. The little girl who was always alone is now surrounded by friends who admire and respect her. The dream is now a reality. For Anne, they say, is pretty now—or if she isn't pretty she is certainly charming, for she always wears clothes that are just suited to her—clothes with a touch of her own personality added—clothes that in their every line and drape suggest the love of youth and beauty—clothes that are only the more attractive because she made them herself.

Anne and Bob have a smart little dress shop now, right in the heart of the town. They're married, you know—but that's an entirely different story.

What the School of Modern Dress Will Do for You

After great research and experiment, after extensive tests and improvements, a complete course in modern clothes-making has been written. It has been brought up to the last minute. All impractical details have been weeded out. All old-time methods have been replaced. Only the newest, quickest, most practical and easy-to-follow methods of cutting, fitting and sewing have been included—and the complete course is certainly the newest and most up-to-date in the world.

Please do not confuse this course with any other ever written. It is different. It is the only course of its kind. It teaches the hand method and the machine method. It teaches you how to tuck ten yards of material in ten minutes, how to ruffle and shirr and plait ten yards in ten minutes, how to cut clothes quickly and with no trouble, how to obtain a perfect, tailored fit that defies any suggestion of a home-made look. It does not teach machine sewing alone or hand sewing alone; it does not teach style-creating or clothes-construction alone; but it teaches all of them in a simple, understandable, interesting way that you will actually enjoy.

Not only is the School of Modern Dress the only school in the world that teaches the newest, most up-to-date and rapid methods of sewing, but it is also the only school that provides its students absolutely free with materials and trimmings necessary to make certain garments taught in the course. For instance, you receive sufficient material and trimming during the course to make a collar-and-cuff set, a chemise, a waist, a house dress and an afternoon frock. And in addition, you are furnished with a handsome sewing basket containing needle, thimble, thread, scissors, bodkin, tape measure, and other valuable equipment.

"I should have said it if you had not. It has truly been one of the days that the Lord has blessed. It came into my mind when I heard you read the names of four of your Friday evening class, and I saw the tears spring to Mr. Miller's eyes."

"Dear old fellow!" said Haile affectionately. "He loves the lads as well as I do. I have great hopes for them all. Most of them have their way to make in the world. I remind them frequently that to 'mark time' is as truly to obey their Commander as to obey an order to march on. And Miller backs me up bravely. I have been disheartened times without number, how often and how sorely even you could not suspect, and only the Master knew that those who should hold up my hands in the fight with the world, the flesh and the devil, have so little appreciation of what constitutes the real prosperity of the church."

"I know!"—interposed the wife sorrowfully. "Why, Mrs. Stone told me the other day when I hoped that we should have additions to the church from the older Sunday-school pupils, that 'now that revivals have gone out of fashion in our higher class churches we don't expect as many additions from the young and the gay as we used to have.' I thought of it when I saw that eight out of the twelve admitted as members today were young people, and I thanked God and took courage!"

"Thanked God and took courage!"—repeated Haile thoughtfully. "How naturally the words fall into line and what a storehouse of comfort they reveal!"

THE alarm of the door-bell and a bustle in the hall heralded the entrance of three men—all portly, jovial.

First strode Silas Ford, next came Alonzo Dennis, banker; and last in the line, Oscar Evans, stockbroker in Wall Street—all citizens of substance, if not of renown.

Silas enclosed one of Haile's hands in both of his big paws:

"Good evening, Doctor! Good evening!"

The pastor had received the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity ten days before, and Silas was punctilious in the use of the title.

"These gentlemen have been dining with me," he continued, when all were seated. "And we were unanimous in the opinion that we ought to call and congratulate you upon the valuable addition to the muster-roll today."

Haile repressed a smile. "Thank you! Mrs. Haile and I were just saying that we have cause for deep gratitude in seeing such a goodly number of the young enter the service of the Master. I hope it is but the beginning of a great awakening."

"Oh, yes, of course," began Silas, slightly taken aback, when Dennis, who had the tongue of a ready talker, came to his relief.

"What we referred to in particular, Doctor, was the prize you have secured in Mr. King. We ought to have had the 'Hallelujah Chorus' sung today if ever. He is the very last man I should expect to see in the fold of the church. By the way—" chuckling—"MacArthur got off a neat thing about that the other night after the meeting. He said that you 'hoisted King over the fence into the vineyard without wasting time in opening the gate.' Do you know, you are known on the street as 'the fighting parson'? We are proud of you, sir! The story has brought you more reputation in a month than the finest preaching would have earned in ten years!"

The color mounted high in Haile's face and his tone was stern.

"I am more grieved than I can express that Mr. MacArthur should have made a jest of what should be treated with profound respect and reverence by every Christian who has a right sense of sacred things. I am sorry—very sorry!"

SILENCE fell upon the group until it could be felt by the least sensitive. Silas rushed to the rescue of his brother official:

"Ah, we all know MacArthur, and that we can't judge him by arbitrary rule and measure! He is as much gratified as the rest of us by the change in King. I hope he can break himself of swearing! It doesn't sound well in a church member. And he seemed incorrigible. They say he swore at you like a trooper that day."

"Who say?" demanded Haile imperatively.

"Why, folks in general and nobody in particular. Somehow the story took wind and after that the birds of the air as one may say, carried it hither and yon."

"Very likely Mr. Miller was one of the birds," put in Oscar Evans, who had remained silent until now. "They say he picked up King as he lay stunned upon the sidewalk, and took him home in a cab and put him to bed, then went for the doctor."

"More and more lies!" cried the baited minister. "In the first place the man did not fall to the pavement and was not stunned. In the second place, when he got home he paid and dismissed the chauffeur, said 'good-bye' to Miller, and let himself into the house with a latchkey he took from his own pocket. Who has nothing better to do than to invent and circulate such lies?"

"There, there, Doctor! don't get excited!" pleaded Silas. "Be thankful that we managed to keep them out of the papers. And console yourself by thinking that 'all's well that ends well.' This might have cost you a church and lost us the smartest pastor we ever had. By the way, Doctor, some time I'll trouble you to give me the names and addresses of the four fellows from your Friday-night class who joined today. I may be able to help them along in some way. I often tell young men that they can't do a better thing from more than one point of view than to join a 'live' church. It pays!"

"There's Dr. Cameron. Ten years ago he was struggling along making just enough to keep his head above water when I persuaded him to cast in his lot with us. As somebody—Moses, wasn't it?—said to somebody else, I told him, 'Come thou with us and we will do thee good!' And we did! He 'joined' and look at him now! Two or three of us recommended him to one and another of our congregations—at first among the plainer folks, you know, and as he grew in popularity, to some of the upper-crusters. In another ten years he will be rich and fashionable. He had sense enough to take a practical man's advice. That's what I call cold business!"

"Cold business!"—growled Haile when the trio left the room which had seemed to grow narrow and stifling, whereas it had been airy and spacious before they came in. "So cold that I am chilled to the marrow of my bones and to the core of my heart!"

CHAPTER XIX

THE Hailes had leased the cottage in the Catskills for a second summer, and took possession of it in July. In the early part of August they invited Anslem Miller and Mrs. Thursby to occupy the cozy quarters for a fortnight, they having engaged to cruise for two weeks in Northern waters in the Kings' yacht, The Kingfisher.

The excursion was a triumphant success for the entire party. The children were bountifully supplied with books and sports and were speedily upon the friendliest of terms with the seamen. Their parents were free to enjoy to the full the much-needed respite from toil and besetting cares.

"That piano is a new and a surprise gift," Mrs. King informed her friend in one of their after-supper chats in the luxuriously furnished saloon. They sat at ease in lounging-chairs facing each other close to a window through which they had glimpses of the distant shore dotted with lights, with now and then the far-distant beacon lamp of a lighthouse upon a projecting tongue of land and over all the dark blue firmament strewn with stars.

"I had always wanted to have one here," the wife went on, softly, "but knowing Rupert's more than indifference to music, I held my peace. A few days before we sailed, he told me that he had bought a lot of stuff for the yacht and would I mind going down to look it over. When we got here the first things I saw were these lounges heaped with cushions. Then we strolled down the saloon and there was a lovely piano set within a recess that must have been built for it. I was so overcome that I dropped my head upon his shoulder and cried like a baby. The last two months have been the happiest of my married life and for those I have to bless your husband—surely the wisest adviser that ever a woman had."

"He was only the instrument, dear, and the original soil was good."

"He cleared away the stones and stubble that prevented the sun from reaching that soil," persisted Mrs. King. "To use a Scriptural phrase, 'The Sun of Righteousness!'" She repeated the words tenderly, as if speaking of a beloved friend. "I said it to myself this morning when I saw the sun rise over the sea. 'With healing in his wings!' The figure was never so beautiful to me before."

BY a not unnatural coincidence the talk of the two men who sat upon the deck overhead was in somewhat the same channel. The growing intimacy between them, paradoxical to most of their associates, was daily more interesting to both. They talked now under the kindly stars with the freedom of old friends.

"Mine was a hard bringing-up," King was saying. "I had a stern father who took little interest in me except to beat me when a cruel stepmother told him that I deserved it, and her own son three years older than myself, made up the rest of the family. This boy seldom addressed me without an oath or a blow. He bullied me into a cowardly lick-spittle until I grew so much taller and stronger than he that the tables were turned. I was but fifteen when I was set adrift to earn my own living. For ten years I fought a hard battle with life. Then the tide turned and I had room to breathe. I should have been a dull scholar if I had not discovered by then that money is power the world over. It got me on some way into what is known in a certain set as polite society. I had to learn to dress and act and to some extent, talk the lingo."

"After my good angel—I had one then—threw me into the society of Sara Duncan"—Haile admired the man in his soul as he saw him raise his hat instinctively—"I made it the aim of my life to secure a footing upon her level. She was very kind to me from the first, and I began to hope by-and-by that she knew what I felt and wanted. When I found out I loved her I vowed a mighty vow that she should be mine."

"When the opportunity came I told her that I loved her distractedly and that if she refused me, I would blow my brains out—and I meant every word of it!"

A long silence followed. King breathed hard and fast.

"Let that pass!" he continued. "I can see now as if a bandage were stripped from my eyes what a cad and cur I made of myself in trying to prove that I could afford to despise the accomplishments that made her courted and popular. I was sometimes madly jealous of her music and books and tried to hide this. But there!—what is the use of raking up what is past and gone, I hope devoutly forever. There's one thing that troubles me, Doctor, that worries me more than you can think. I mean this inveterate habit of swearing. You who probably never let slip an oath in your life cannot judge charitably of a fellow whose daily speech has been peppered and salted with them for forty-odd years."

"Set thou a watch before the door of my lips that I sin not against Thee," quoted the other. "Thus prayed a man who had the same habit."

"I wonder," said King after a short pause, "if I shall ever be able to express one-tenth of what I feel with regard to my obligations to you for all you have done for me. I had, as you know, no religious training in my youth. One text recurs to my mind again and again,—'So foolish was I and ignorant, I was as a beast before Thee.'"

HE COULD not see Haile smile, but he heard the tremor in the voice that said: "Dear old fellow, never mind about that! All will come right in time."

For a long minute, the swish of the yacht through the water and the pulsing of the engines were the only interruptions of their reverie. When King spoke again, it was in a lower tone and a different key.

"I do not know if you ever heard that there were twin babies born to us the second year of our marriage—twin girls, Sara and Agatha. I named one, and my wife the other. They lived but ten months, and died within a week of each other. A year later there was a boy, whose birth nearly cost his mother her life. He was but a day old when he died. She had him baptised 'Rupert.' For years we never spoke of him. We could not. The girls would be six years old by now. The boy would be four."

Haile laid his arm over the broad shoulders and felt them heave.

"They are six and four years old! The 'always beholding the face of the Father' makes them wiser, but not older. They are safely kept for you. You will know one another when you meet."

At this moment a brilliant burst of music came from below. The prelude glided into a more stately measure—a familiar air, at once recognized—

"Rocked in the cradle of the deep,
I lay me down in peace to sleep."

The captain had signaled slow-speed and the words of the last verse arose distinctly to the ears of the two men who leaned over the guards above the open windows.

"And such the trust that still were mine,
Though blasting waves swept o'er the brine,

And though the tempest's fiery breath
Wake me from sleep to pain and death,—

Secure in ocean's cave with Thee
The Germ of Immortality,—

Peaceful I'd lie and sweetly sleep

Methodism's Gains in a Decade

DR. H. K. CARROLL, the statistician of the churches, whose annual presentation of the conditions of the various denominations has been prepared for the Christian Herald and published in its columns and also wide-spread throughout the religious and secular press, for many years, has just completed a review of Methodism in America, during the decade from 1911 to 1921. This was prepared specially with a view to the decennial Methodist Conference held in London, England. Dr. Carroll shows that a net gain of 1,255,091 members has been made by all divisions of the Methodist Church in the United States in the last ten years, despite great losses suffered during the war.

"Nineteen nineteen was the hardest year the churches of America have known," Dr. Carroll writes, "at least since the Civil War. Methodism in most of its branches suffered, with the evangelical denominations, actual losses. The Methodist Episcopal Church suffered most of all, losing 43,262 in 1918 and 59,987 in 1919—103,249 in two years—and the conditions were even worse if we leave out foreign missions fields, for the net loss in this country alone in 1919 was nearly 70,000. The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, lost 16,404 in that year. In 1920 the tide turned for all evangelical churches, heavy gains succeeding the losses.

"Considering the heavy losses in the previous two years it is remarkable that the total net increase in members and probationers of the Methodist bodies of the Western section has been 1,255,091, exceeding the increase of the previous decade, 1900-1910, by nearly 282,000. The percentage of increase is also greater. For the decade ending in 1910, it was 15; for the past ten years, nearly 17. The net increase of Sunday school pupils for all Methodist bodies (in the world) for the ten years is 1,289,036."

Why Enter the Ministry?

By REV. CHARLES E. WARD
Pastor of Park Church, Toledo, Ohio

NOT since the day of Saint Peter has so much been said about the lack of Christian ministers. In an editorial paragraph in a leading religious weekly, it was recently stated that there were thirty thousand pastorless churches in the United States. In the national councils or conferences of the leading religious bodies this is a much discussed subject.

Careful survey of the facts discloses that the vast majority of the thousands of vacant pulpits in America today have been vacant through most of the years they have existed and are doomed to remain so. The number of churches showing capacity of growth and willingness to pay a living wage, that are without ministers, is not appreciably larger than ten years ago. Of course, it goes without saying that the living wage has risen.

The greatest cause for alarm in the present situation arises from the unwillingness of young men to consider the ministry as a life calling. An appealing letter sent out by the Dean of a prominent theological seminary last spring stated that the decline in candidates for the ministry among three leading denominations to be 31 per cent. since last year!

The reasons for the present unwillingness of young men to enter the ministry are several. The one most emphasized just now is the economic. The Inter-Church World Movement, leading secular and religious publications, the daily papers, have all shared in a wide publicity of the fact that the Church, one of the largest business concerns in the land, paid an average wage to its employees of $937 per annum! Magazines have published articles under such headings as: "Suffering That Less Than Living Wages Causes Ministers' Wives and Children," until young men who are half awake may well pause before considering such a calling. Here are some of the facts concerning the living a young man may expect in the ministry: One per cent. receive $4,000 or more; 7 per cent. receive $2,000 or more; 84 per cent. receive less than $1,000; 13 per cent. receive less than $500.

We can not hide these facts from wide awake young men who might consider the ministry as a life calling. The year book of a certain denomination reveals the fact that the average salary paid by that denomination in 1920 was just $12 larger than in 1890. If the young man in high school or college looking forward to some form of Christian leadership as a life-work could see relief from such a situation he would not be deterred. But the willingness of the Church to permit the continuance of such an economic situation discourages possible candidates for her leadership. One of the glaring advertisements of the Inter-Church, for example, was: "52c., How Would You Like a Raise Like That?" Below this large headline it was stated that the minister was paid on the average just fifty-two cents more per church member per year than thirty-four years ago!

However, I think too much emphasis has been placed on the economic factor. We have talked too much of wages in connection with ministerial shortage.

ANOTHER reason for the lack of candidates for the ministry today has been the emphasis of the Church over the past decade that a man may do the will of God just as well in any other legitimate and needed field of endeavor as in the ministry. Men have proclaimed that God calls men to be butchers and bakers and candlestick-makers just as truly as He calls men to preach the Good News.

Let us follow the reasoning of the college man brought up on this theory: "If I can do the will of God by being a Christian business man just as well as being a minister of Christ, why should

I consider the ministry? By applying my genius, education, and foresight in some legitimate business, I can ride in a limousine by the time I am middle-aged, and by the time the frost gets on my hair I can own a winter home in Florida. Furthermore, I will not be the butt of ridicule in the movies or the funny paper, and my friends will not look upon me with half contempt and pity because of my poverty." If one can do the will of God just as well outside Christian life-work as in, it is argued, why make the sacrifice demanded by such a calling?

A third reason for the present scarcity of candidates for the ministry is that the Church has been talked down too much. Who wants to cast in his lot with a failing institution? The Church has never passed through such a period of severe criticism. Stones have been thrown from those within and without. The lodge man does not "knock" his fraternity, but the same man will lambaste his church.

And the Church deserves better at the hands of society than it is receiving today. If we could wipe out overnight what present-day civilization owes to the Church, she would be appreciated more! Furthermore, this criticism has been mainly destructive; it has often fallen to the level of a peevish old woman's complaining. The truth would compel an honest man of vision to state that the Church of Christ was never more efficient, never more awake, never so needed as today. But the young men who might enter the ministry are filled with the sarcastic, bitter and unfair criticism that has been hurled at the Church by carping critics. They feel that to enter its ministry would be to share at once this attack.

WHAT is the remedy for such a situation? It is partly psychological. The decent laborer will render better service when he is encouraged than when he is flogged. Let those who believe in the Church, in spite of her faults—and she has many—talk up the wonderful achievements she has brought about. For she has accomplished more in the last century than in the previous eighteen! Let the criticism be positive and helpful; any fool can find fault. If the leaders in pulpit and pew and editorial room will launch a psychology campaign telling the good points of the Church there will come forth leaders to man our pulpits.

The Church must solve the problem of a living wage for its employees, or deserve the scorn of big business and the cry: "Hypocrite!"

A part of the remedy of the situation lies in honoring the ministry as the men who minister deserve. Sixty-five American chaplains were killed or wounded during the war; others received decorations for brave and distinguished service. That is typical of the bravery and willingness to sacrifice found in the ministry. There is too much of a spirit of pity and half contempt felt for the minister today. And the average man in the pulpit isn't looking for pity! Let the young man who would consider the call to preach the Good News feel that he will be taken at his true value.

There is too little willingness on the part of church members to have their own sons take up the work of the ministry or the mission fields. We want the Church to live and serve, but we are selfish enough to want the other man's son, rather than our own, to assume the ministerial or missionary tasks. We think too much in terms of money wages! As Rev. Hubert C. Herring has said: "There is no one so overpaid as the minister, for love is the highest wage of life." And where else can a man possess a deeper consciousness of God's approving love, or the lasting affection of his fellow men?

How to Reduce

Your Weight

YOU CAN do it in a dignified, simple way in the privacy of your room and surprise your family and friends.

I know you can, because I've reduced 45,000 women from 20 to 85 lbs., and what I have done for so many I can do for you.

Don't reduce by drugs or diet alone. You'll look old if you do. You should have work adapted to your condition.

No woman need carry one pound of excess fat. It's so simple to weigh what you should, and you enjoy the process. My cheerful letters and your scales keep you enthusiastic. I build your vitality, strengthen your heart and teach you how to stand, walk and breathe correctly, as I reduce you.

If you send me your height and weight, I'll tell you just what you should weigh. No charge—and I'll send you an illustrated booklet FREE, showing you how to stand correctly. Write me! I will respect your confidence.

Paul Before the Roman Governor

International Sunday School Lesson for November 13
Acts 23:25 to 24:27

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

IN LESS than two weeks after Agabus had prophesied in Caesarea that Paul would be bound in Jerusalem, Paul was back in Caesarea, a prisoner of Governor Felix. Events had moved very rapidly. After the plot against Paul had been discovered by his nephew, the night journey from Jerusalem was started and Paul was safe in the midst of a guard of at least 470 men. It is an open question as to when those forty sworn assassins began to eat and drink, because they had declared they would do neither till Paul had been killed. Their attack was really against God, and under such circumstances failure is the only result. As for Paul, the great ambition of his life was in process of realization—he was on his way to Rome, though he must go to Caesarea first and tarry there two years.

Five days after the arrival of Paul the accusing Jews from Jerusalem with their Roman lawyer, Tertullus, came to wreak their vengeance on the man who had escaped them in Jerusalem. These cold, deliberate charges were now made: (1) Sedition, stirring up the Jews throughout the Roman Empire; (2) sectarianism, ringleader of the Nazarene sect; (3) sacrilege, profaning the temple.

As Tertullus made his points the attending Jews, with Ananias, the high priest, wagged their heads in approval. The governor then beckoned to Paul, probably with a nod of the head, and the great logician began his address and defense. Paul riddled the charges of Tertullus and showed Felix that all his statements could be easily verified, as the whole thing had taken place within the past twelve days, since he had come to Jerusalem. Paul again made major use of the opportunity to declare that he is of the Way of Jesus Christ, and once more insisted on his belief in the resurrection. Felix evidently knew the truth of the case, but played to the Jews, fenced for time and continued the case till Lysias should come down.

IN THE providence of God, Paul was to have a vacation from public work for two years. He surely needed the rest after his hard work at tent-making, traveling, preaching, enduring persecutions of many kinds, caring for the churches, all of which had been nearly continuous for the years since the beginning of his first missionary journey. Special liberty was given to Paul and his friends had access to him. Luke certainly was with him.

During these two years Luke doubtless wrote the Acts, and also worked on the Gospel of Luke. There is no record of literary work by Paul, but he surely thought many things through and had the material in mind for writing Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians, which went forth from the Rome prison. The classic illustration here is Bunyan, who wrote his great "Pilgrim's Progress" while in Bedford jail.

Felix hoped for the usual bribery, but in this he was of course disappointed. Paul must have had access to some money during these two years, but he would not spend it unlawfully to gain his liberty. Ramsay thinks that Paul came into possession of his patrimony at this time and used it for some prison comforts, or the churches may have sent gifts to Paul, as they did on the second and third journeys. You will find the chapter "Paul at Bay" very illuminating in Robertson's "Epochs in the Life of Paul."

To appreciate the statements of Paul when he had that private audience with Felix and Drusilla, there must be a background of history. Governors and kings can have unenviable family histories, and those of Felix, Drusilla, Festus and Agrippa II are cases in hand. All know how horrible was the death of Herod I after he had killed James the apostle to please the populace (Acts 12:23). Drusilla and Bernice were daughters of this Herod and Agrippa II was a son. Felix had enticed Drusilla from her former husband, though at the time of the lesson she was only about 18 years old. Bernice repeatedly lived in marriage relation with her own brother Agrippa II. Herod the Great, who slaughtered the innocent children at the time of the birth of Jesus, was the great grandfather of this infamous trio—Drusilla, Bernice and Agrippa II. Knowing Paul as we do, no question is raised in our mind as to how he would speak before such people. Paul was as direct and clear as when John the Baptist said to Herod the Tetrarch (a great uncle of Drusilla), "It is not right for thee to have thy brother Philip's wife." Every sermon and Sunday-school lesson should be applicable to the special needs of the present audience. There is a judgment which faces every one and Paul declared that fact. No wonder that Felix was terrified.

BEFORE just such an audience Paul "reasoned of righteousness, and self-control and the judgment to come." He had been invited to the palace by Felix and his Jewish wife, Drusilla. Doubtless Paul made many direct and personal statements of fact to this couple which are not recorded because of the private nature of the occasion. He had to speak or stand condemned at the time of his own judgment when Christ the Judge would ask him about the message uttered in the private interview at Caesarea. When that time came, Paul would be undisturbed; but not so with the governor and his wife. Felix, who was terrified, sent Paul away with the statement that he would seek him again at a "convenient season." The fear of Felix was evidently unrelated to penitence. Where fear does not lead to faith, as in the case of the jailer at Philippi, there is a hardening of the heart which makes a greater wall of defense against the next appeal to do right.

The prisoner is the free man, rather than the governor. Paul had declared in verse 16, "Herein I also exercise myself to have a conscience void of offence toward God and men always." Such a condition helps to produce peace by day and sound sleep by night. Further, there is a wonderful assurance against the time when each shall give an account of the deeds done in the body and all thoughts, words and actions shall be brought in review. Paul now used the word "conscience" with a far different meaning than when he was a persecutor of the Jews. Before Agrippa (26:9) he said, "I verily thought with myself that I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth." If our conscience does not make decisions which are in close harmony with the moral and spiritual teachings of the Bible, there is something serious the matter with that conscience. Just because we permit ourselves to think a thing right does not make it right. The conscience that makes good decisions today may decide wrongly tomorrow. However accurately our watches may run, we verify them when we find the absolutely correct time. Even so we must always check up on conscience by continuously going to the absolute Truth, even God.

"Go thy way" is still a subterfuge to avoid giving up the wrong of today. The sense of pain indicates the need for some remedial action and not for an opiate to deaden the consciousness of that pain. "Now is the acceptable time; behold now is the day of salvation." 2 Cor. 6:2.

We would be glad to learn what proportion of Sunday schools are using the International lessons and which the graded lessons. Will you tell us which is your choice?

"What a healthy, pink color your skin is, my dear."
"Oh, I am eating Yeast Foam."

Why more faces glow with a clear natural color

Skin impurities often come from ill health

YOU should know that skin specialists no longer expect external treatments to relieve skin trouble. Acne, pimples, blackheads, boils, are now known to be indications of lowered vitality, due usually to the absence in the ordinary diet of vitamins, food's vital essence.

Scientists everywhere have confirmed each other's findings that yeast is the richest source of the much needed vitamins. While present in some other foods it is not found in many of the commonest foods. Potatoes, meat, fish, some breads, many cereals, all fats, sugar, syrup, do not contain the life-giving essence known as water soluble vitamins. Many vegetables possess it, but boiled as they usually are, this vital element is often peeled or soaked away.

Physicians now know that there are many physical disorders that actually originate within the body due to errors in diet and deficient nutrition—vitamin hunger. Most skin disorders are now considered deficient diseases. They occur mostly among those who are subject to minor languors and need building up in general.

Many have built up their general physical condition and cleared their skins by eating one to three cakes of Yeast Foam a day. You, like thousands of others, will find Yeast Foam effective because it is the right treatment. It gets at the cause of the trouble and removes it.

The most obstinate cases of skin eruptions will show improvement if the treatment is consistently kept up for several weeks.

Eat a third, half or whole cake three times a day before meals

It's the same Yeast Foam you know so well as a bread raiser.

Yeast Foam is easily eaten; it is a wholesome, edible food and you'll soon like the taste.

Many eat the cake plain. Some follow it with a little water or milk.

Some mash it fine with a rolling pin and mix it with other foods.

Others dissolve the cake and drink off the water containing the yeast.

You'll find it convenient to carry a package of Yeast Foam around with you, eating a cake at convenient times.

Begin eating Yeast Foam today while awaiting more interesting information which we shall be glad to send free.

Buying Bonds BY MAIL

PEOPLE today find it safe to buy anything they want by mail from well-known reliable houses. Such institutions cannot afford to disappoint; their business is based upon confidence.

The same is true of investments. It is even more satisfactory to buy bonds by mail than merchandise. You do not need to see a bond before buying; you can find out all about it in advance. The terms and conditions of a bond are easily appraised; a description of them, from a competent source, is sufficient. Halsey, Stuart & Co. has perfected a system for selling bonds by mail which is safe, prompt and simple. The buyer runs no risks about delivery. Bonds are sent by registered mail at our risk and at our expense direct to purchaser, or they may be delivered through his bank.

Bonds may be purchased from us by mail on a cash or monthly payment basis. Full details will be sent upon request—write for circular C. H. - 6

Small Bond Investments

American Security Houses Now Welcome Purchasers with Limited Funds

By C. R. LEAKE

IT IS only recently that the bankers of this country have come to realize the necessity of offering high-grade bonds in small denominations. The reason for such a change, of course, was that business required capital and the small investors' funds were badly needed. The majority of recent bond offerings have been made in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Abroad, for years, the small investor has known the advantage of accumulating sound investments. Our bankers during the same period neglected the man or woman with a few hundred dollars for investment.

In the first place there was always plenty of money to finance business and trade ready at hand. Families of wealth and large corporations were always in the market for worth-while securities yielding a fair interest return. Secondly, there was no great object in spending large sums to develop and educate a class of investors who could invest a few hundred or a few thousand dollars at the most each year. Therefore funds of small investors could not compete with those of the wealthy for safety or return, and they have had to be content with the savings banks or with buying real estate mortgages.

Today the opportunity is offered to large and small investors alike. The soundest kind of bonds may be bought in small denominations with the knowledge that there is every likelihood of our always enjoying a ready market in "Baby Bonds."

Reputable bonds firms and banks which maintain investment departments are competing today for the business of small investors, who have recently taken a very important place among bond buyers.

THESE conditions deserve careful consideration. They offer an opportunity for thrift and all the benefits to be gained by a sound and systematic savings plan. If we can not arrange to invest as much as $100, $500 or $1,000 at a time we are offered the chance to buy these same high-grade securities on the partial-payment plan, in some cases as low as $2 a week. The far-sighted will start immediately, if only in a small way.

The prosperity of the United States, the return to better and more normal times depends in a very large measure on the success of the nation's bankers in placing sound securities in the hands of a large and ever-increasing number of investors. It is not only very smart business on our part but a real duty to practice thrift in this country as widely as possible. It will not only benefit every individual who has a definite savings plan which includes a sound and profitable plan for investment but it will restore business confidence and greatly help to prevent future business depressions.

Too much stress can not be laid on the importance of selecting a reputable investment house. The very best of them now maintain at considerable cost departments which are both willing and anxious to give courteous treatment and sound advice to each individual making inquiry.

NOW for a word concerning the Investment Department of Christian Herald. As has been stated before both to advertisers and to readers our first thought in maintaining it, is that it may prove to be a real service to our readers, to direct and help if possible in the selection of a reliable bond house, and continually to point out the dangers of investing without proper advice. We will accept the advertising of only those houses which we believe to be perfectly reliable and only those that confine themselves to the offering of sound government, municipal, public utility and and first mortgage bonds and well-rated preferred stocks.

You will note that we have been running regularly a list of Free Investment circulars. This financial literature is published by some of the best banks and investment houses in the country. We have special arrangements with these concerns to supply these booklets to all readers of the Christian Herald who wish to devote time and study to the investment field. You not only get these circulars free but the advantages of especially equipped investment departments devoting their whole time to the study of safe investments. They can not afford to make mistakes in giving advice and in selling you securities as they depend for their profit on your continued satisfaction with both the securities being offered by them and their helpful service. Safeguarding your interests is the first consideration of an investment banker as the business of the small investor is not profitable unless a regular customer is made of him.

Missionary Progress in Venezuela

REV. T. J. BACH, of the Scandinavian Alliance Mission, writes to the Christian Herald from Maracaibo, Venezuela:

"Your recent letter, together with your check for $86.50, were received by this last mail, for which I wish to thank you. May our heavenly Father richly repay you and the Christian Herald friends for remembering this mission field of the most neglected part of the Neglected Continent. Our number of missionaries has recently been increased by three new workers, so we hope soon to be able to put up new mission stations. The work of the Lord is spreading more and more and the demand for Bibles and Christian literature is growing every day.

"We have now a modern day school with four teachers. The membership in our Sunday school is constantly growing, and last week seven new members were proposed for our Christian Endeavor Society. We have some new members added to our church nearly every month. Our Spanish Evangelical paper: 'La Estrella de la Mañana' is gaining new fields. It has always been published without any denominational color, and we are now planning, together with other missionary societies in Venezuela, to make a union paper of it, so that it will serve all and do more effective work for Christ.

"We continue to give a helping hand to the lepers. Every month I go to a little out-station, about fifteen miles away. The last time I was out there I had two rather unpleasant surprises. After the service was over, I went outside to shake hands with those who could not find room inside and without my knowing it, a leper placed his hand in mine. I noticed that parts of his fingers were missing. On my way home the same evening, while riding alone in the forest, about eleven o'clock, a shot was fired at me from behind, but it pleased God to protect me. Our industrial work is prospering also; we have now given work to eight girls."

of materials for manufactures. £10,000,000 is to be allocated for the assistance of relief works, forestry and land drainage and £300,000 is to be appropriated to help former soldiers emigrate to the Dominions, as 60,000 already have been enabled to do. A fund for workers' dependents is to be established, but the Premier declared relief work is unsatisfactory and the dole system worse, since they do not get at the roots of the unemployment problem.

Charles Back in Hungary

THE former Emperor Charles has engaged in a new attempt to reseat himself on the throne of Hungary, and after an airplane flight from Switzerland has begun a march on Budapest in which he has the support of several thousand soldiers. His troops were said to have been victorious in the initial fighting with the forces loyal to the Horthy government near Budapest, and it was reported the Horthy régime had fallen.

The Allied ministers in Budapest presented a joint note giving warning that no member of the Hapsburg family would be allowed to rule in Hungary again, and at the same time the members of the Little Entente—Jugoslavia, Czechoslovakia and Rumania—were threatening to invade Hungary to oust Charles from the throne should his adventure succeed.

PORTUGUESE GOVERNMENT OVERTHROWN. A revolution in which the crews of warships in the harbor of Lisbon took the lead and were joined by the Republican Guard has overthrown the Portuguese government and a new Nationalist ministry has assumed control. Among the several prominent men reported slain by the revolutionists were Premier Granjo and Admiral Machado dos Santos, founder of the Portuguese Republic and at one time its president. The government has been unstable and there had been seven changes in the Premiership since January 1.

IRISH PARLEYS CONTINUE. Representatives of the Sinn Féin and of the British government have continued their negotiations, but have not yet reached the vital questions. A communication from the Pope to King George expressing hope that a settlement would be reached, to which the King replied cordially, evoked from Eamon de Valera a message to the pontiff bitterly assailing British policies and denying that Ireland owes any allegiance to the King. The attitude thus expressed threatened to cause the collapse of the parleys.

TWO FAMOUS PAINTINGS SOLD. The Duke of Westminster has sold Gainsborough's "The Blue Boy" and Reynolds's "Mrs. Siddons as the Tragic Muse," two of England's most famous paintings, to a firm which intends to bring them to America. The total price was £200,000—normally almost $1,000,000—of which it was figured £170,000 was the price of "The Blue Boy."

AMERICA HONORS BRITAIN'S UNKNOWN WARRIOR. The Congressional Medal, America's highest military award, voted to Britain's unknown warrior as a tribute to British soldiers and sailors who died in the World War, has been placed on the grave in Westminster Abbey by General Pershing. The ceremonies were simple but impressive, and occasioned an exchange of pledges of international friendship. King George is to confer the Victoria Cross on the American unknown soldier who is to be buried at Arlington Cemetery on Armistice Day.

TRINITY RECTOR CHOSEN. Rev. Dr. C. Rochford Stetson, of St. Mark's Church, Washington, has been chosen as rector of the famous Trinity Church in New York City, to succeed Bishop William T. Manning of the Episcopal Diocese of New York. For several years preceding 1911, when he went to Washington, he had been vicar of Trinity Church.

GERMAN CABINET RESIGNS. The Worth ministry in Germany has resigned as a result of the Supreme Council decision regarding Upper Silesia by which Poland received a considerable portion of the plebiscite area. The situation in the Reichstag was confused and there was delay in forming a new ministry, since several of the parties had not determined on their policy.

Young People's Topic for Nov. 13

By REV. RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN

Bible Examples of Personal Evangelism

C. E., B. Y. P. U. and E. L.
See Matt. 4: 18-22; Matt. 9: 9. 10;
John 1: 1-51

LET the leader read all of the above references. These Scripture passages contain the program of Jesus which is the program of His followers. The function of the Young People's Society is to promote the social life by sane recreation and healthful play, to visit the sick and shut-ins and bring gifts of cheer and comfort, to study missions and promote them with money and publicity. But above all the function of the Young People's Society is the winning of souls, interesting others in the church, introducing the world to God and Jesus Christ and the fellowship of their redemptive purpose. All other interests and activities and programs and methods are contributory to the main purpose of evangelism, saving souls, regenerating individuals and transforming by this regeneration the status of society and creating a new social fabric. Jesus was sent into the world to save souls. "Even so send I you," He said to His disciples. "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel."

Read the first chapter of John's Gospel and learn how one man was found by Jesus. What did he do? We are told that he went and found his brother. Andrew did a great thing when he found Peter. After that Peter did a great thing when he preached the great sermon on the day of Pentecost. The way the Christian Church began is the way it must be continued: One person found another and that other person immediately went forth to find another.

Jesus alone can save the world, but Jesus can not save the world alone. "Ye are my witnesses." Try the method of the disciples. Interest your chum in the society to which you belong. Make it a rule to bring some one with you to the next meeting. Strange as it may seem, the reason why our societies do not grow is because we are lagging with the invitation. Of course young people ought to come without being asked, considering the advantages of membership. But human nature is built that way. The lament of the outsider is "No man careth for my soul." The cry is not audible, folks do not wear their hearts on their sleeves, they often have the mistaken idea that the church is for the favored few. The church is not a social club, but a fellowship, a brotherhood and a neighborhood of hearts sympathetically united in a co-operative endeavor in the interests of the greatest good to the greatest number. There are many miracles for which God alone is responsible, but there are co-operative miracles that depend on God and man working together. It is our high privilege to be co-workers together with God. "The Son of Man came to seek and to find the lost." The last, the least and the lost are our objective and our only objective. To save souls, that is our task and our only task.

We recommend for investment

Double Your Income Get 8%, with safety assured

Do you know what happens when you deposit money in your savings bank? Simply this; your money is in turn invested by the bank at a higher rate of interest than the bank pays you. By investing direct in securities such as a bank holds, you not only get the safety of money in the bank, but you double your interest income, because you are pocketing the commission that your bank ordinarily earns. By investing in Miller Bonds, your money will earn a full 8% instead of 3½ or 4% in the bank.

You will find Miller Bonds a thoroughly safe investment, because they are backed by first mortgage security, and are issued only on income earning, non-speculative, fireproof properties in prosperous localities. An ample Sinking Fund provides that all payments will be made regularly. There are people in your locality who are already investing in Miller Bonds. Ask us to put you in touch with them.

Fascinating Picture Puzzle Contest

Fifteen Cash Prizes

Open To All
Costs Nothing To Try

Fifteen cash prizes as shown below will be given to the fifteen persons sending in the best prepared and nearest correct list of names of objects in the picture beginning with the letter "C." The person sending in the best prepared and nearest correct list will receive first prize; the one sending in the second best list will receive second prize, and so on.

Look closely at the picture. There are all kinds of objects that begin with the letter "C." Nothing is hidden. You do not need to turn the picture upside down. This is not a lottery or guessing contest or a trick puzzle. It is a test of skill in finding names of objects beginning with the letter "C." All objects to be named are shown clearly in the picture.

Here Is The Plan:

In order to win a first prize of $20.00, you do not have to send a cent with your list of words. But we have arranged it so you can win three, ten or twenty-five times that amount simply by taking advantage of our big special sale of books. Two of these remarkable bargains are here described. Either of them is easily worth to you for your own use one-half more than our special sale price. At the same time either of them would make a handsome Christmas gift that any of your friends would prize highly.

WIN $1,000.00 If your answer wins first prize and if you send us a $5.00 order you will receive the Grand Prize of $1,000.00 instead of $20.00; second prize $500.00; third prize $250.00; etc. (See third column in the list of prizes.)

WIN $300.00 If your answer wins first prize and if you send us a $3.00 order you will receive $300.00 as your prize instead of $20.00; second prize $150; third prize $75.00, etc. (See second column in the list of prizes.)

Everybody can enter this contest, men, women and children. Start right now to examine the picture closely; then write your list and send it in without delay. Amusement, instruction and the chance to win a big cash prize—all these are offered by this great contest.

Observe These Rules:

Don't Delay! This Contest Closes November 30, 1921

- 1—The person sending the best prepared and nearest correct list of names of objects appearing in the picture, beginning with the letter "C," will win first prize. The one sending the next best list will receive second prize, etc.
- 2—Write your list of names on one side of the paper only and number them 1, 2, 3, etc. Write your full name and address at the bottom of each page. If you wish to write anything else, be sure to use a separate sheet.
- 3—This ends November 30, 1921. All answers must be received in envelopes bearing post-mark not later than November 30, 1921.
- 4—Persons who live in Chicago or employes of the D. B. CLARKSON COMPANY are not permitted to participate.
- 5—Only such words as appear in the English dictionary will be counted. Where the plural is used, the singular cannot be counted and vice versa. Do not use hyphenated, compound or obsolete words, or words formed of two or more words. These cannot be counted.
- 6—Words of the same spelling can be used only once even though used to designate different objects. The same object can be named only once; however any part of the object may also be named.
- 7—All answers will receive the same consideration whether or not accompanied by an order.
- 8—Any number of members of the same family may compete, but not more than one prize will be awarded to one household; nor will prizes be awarded to more than one of any group outside of the family where two or more have been working together.
- 9—In the event of a tie for any prize offered, a prize of equal value will be awarded to each of those concerned in the tie.
- 10—The following well-known Chicagoans, will act as judges of the contest: Ople Read, Author; Hon. Frank Comerford, Member Chicago bar, appointed Special Prosecutor in "Red" case; Frank Hays, Cashier, Lake Shore Trust & Savings Bank. It is understood that participants will accept the decision of the judges as final and conclusive.
- 11—The announcement of the prize winners and correct list of words will be printed at the close of the contest and a copy mailed to all who purchase books.
Extra copies of the Puzzle Picture will be mailed free on request.

Questions and Answers

L. J. H. Haverhill, Mass., writes: "I have been a subscriber to the Christian Herald for thirty years or more, and thoroughly approve of all its work. The plan for extension of Christian work in China, as given in the paper for September 24, is fine, and I wish some such plan might be used for our children here in America. With all of our splendid means of education, and our churches, how many of our boys and girls go out into the world at eighteen years of age (and some younger) to earn their living and battle with sin, without being fitted for anything in particular, and with no knowledge of God, except to use His name in profanity! There are heathen and worse among our own people. America certainly needs improving, morally, socially and economically, as well as China. When the heathen come to our shores, they find comparatively few living up to Christian ideals here in so-called Christian America. The indifference among our people seems to me to be appalling. Can nothing be done to make America the Christian nation she has the reputation of being, and to save our young people as well as older ones, before they go to reform schools and prisons, instead of afterwards?"

You have hit upon a problem which is taxing the best minds in our land today—the moral and spiritual training of the young. We need a Home Mission arousal, and there are indications that it is coming.

C. R. McC., Golconda, Ill., writes: "As a subscriber to your paper for many years, I would urge you through your columns to begin now to ask your people to observe Watch Night as a season of prayer for revival all over the world."

Mr. W. D. Keyes, Wilkesburg, Pa., sends in the following suggestion, providing for a change in the Creed, which has no doubt occurred to many other persons: "I have felt for years that the time had long gone by when the so-called Apostles' Creed should have been corrected, and the expression, 'the Holy Catholic Church' replaced by the all-comprehensive term, 'the Church of the Triune God,' which would emphasize the Trinity of the Godhead and could be conscientiously used by all consistent Christians throughout the world, in all ages, while the present expression is not understood, is misleading and distasteful to many good people now in, and coming into the Protestant churches everywhere. The term, 'the Holy Catholic Church' was arbitrarily placed in the creed by the authorities of that Church under Pope Julian in 395 A. D., at the suggestion of a very popular Cardinal in Rome, and is perfectly all right for Roman Catholic people everywhere from their standpoint, but has no proper place in Protestant literature or practice, and should have been changed in the very beginning of the Reformation."

The Christian Herald has frequently been asked as to the meaning of the passage in the Creed, and the uniform reply has been made that the word "catholic" in that relation means "universal."

Rev. J. W. Wells, San Jose, Calif., writes: "I rejoice very heartily in your effort to have the 200,000 Protestant churches put themselves on record in favor of disarmament of the nations; but large and powerful as this may be, even if all of them respond, it is nevertheless but one group of citizens who will speak. Lately I wrote and had some strong resolutions passed by my G. A. R. Post, ('Sheridan Dix,' of San Jose,) which the local papers used, and the local agent of the American Press sent out over the country, asking that 'our government' take the lead in urging the disarmament of the nations. It passed unanimously. This is also a group movement, and there are other groups doing the same thing. But as I see it, this is not sufficient. In some way we ought to be able to organize and get an informal vote of all registered voters throughout the country. The organization, once in running order, could be kept up indefinitely to meet any emergency that may arise. As it now stands, a mere handful of interested parties determine the policy and the laws to be made and declare in their own press all over the country that they are responding to Public Opinion—'the will of the people.' Let us have a 'People's Parliament,' or a People's Advisory Council, with local state and national officers, with headquarters in Washington, D. C., with the very ablest and best men and women of our country to represent us, and to lobby for the people's interest. It should be composed of citizens—registered voters—of all political parties, non-partisan, non-sectarian, and open for all citizens. This organization could fill the gap between now and the time when we will have an amendment to the Constitution, giving us National Initiative, Referendum and Recall, similar to that which they have in Switzerland. With such an organization in working order, we could have the known will of the people on any vital subject in less than a month. We need it now as never before, if secret diplomacy is not to dictate the future of this and every other country. Petitions with millions of names attached pleading for this or that from our servants in office, have been sent, and they have thrown them into the waste-basket. The people themselves should take hold and make an uncompromising demand that their mandates shall be obeyed."

Our correspondent—a retired minister and Civil War Veteran—makes a proposition in his letter which deserves consideration. We submit it to the readers of the Mail Bag, inviting a brief expression of their views.

Mrs. C. E. B., Due West, S. C., writes: "In a class of old ladies, in Sunday school today, some of them stated that they heard a minister (a converted Jew) state in his sermon, that 'Christ never preached to any except Jews.' I asked if he gave any Bible references, and they said, 'No.' Will you please help me to answer and explain this?"

While it is true that the earthly ministry of Christ, covering a period of some three years, was conducted within a very limited area and mainly to Jewish audiences, He spoke in language that was applicable to the whole world. In this sense, therefore, His ministry was not confined to the Jews, but reached out to all the Gentile or non-Jewish population, not only in Judea but throughout the world. There are several passages that might be quoted to illustrate this. See John 10:16, 17:18-21, Mark 16:15, 16, Matt. 28:19. Other passages might be quoted which also show that His ministry was universal. If the preacher you mention meant that the whole effort was confined to Jews and intended only for Jews, he was clearly mistaken. There were many nations represented in the Holy Land at that time—men from Rome, from Greece, from various parts of Asia, and other countries, many of whom must have either heard the voice of the Divine Preacher or come into contact with His teaching at some time or other. His teaching is not to be measured in a limited territorial sense, but should be regarded as He meant it to be, as applicable to the entire race of men.

Reader, Peoria, Ill., writes: "Is it not time for the door to begin to open? What would Jesus do at such a time as this? The world is not a fit place for Christian people to live in any longer, neither were the cities of the plain."

It is true that wickedness abounds in the world today. But it is also true that the great body of God's faithful people is larger than at any time in human history. Christian people must face the situation by living close to Christ, and working more energetically than ever to win souls. The solution of all the world's troubles is in God's hands, and He will solve them in His own time and way; but meanwhile the faithful must work, and watch, and pray. To give up in the midst of the struggle would be recreancy in the worst degree. When His time comes, He must find every faithful one at his post, working for the advancement of the Kingdom, no matter at what odds.

M. S. R., Pulaski, N. Y. In the Lord's Prayer, the word "trespasses" instead of debts is regarded simply as a variant, and as carrying practically the same meaning as "debts." The presumption is that Luke (in Chapter 11) made certain changes in the expressions of the prayer in order to make its meaning clearer to Gentile hearers. In Matt. 6:14, 15, the substitution of "trespasses" has justification, according to authorities.

A GREAT LIGHT on PROPHECY!

Dr. Patch's Wonderful Book and What It Reveals

A VERY large proportion of the letters received by the Christian Herald deal with Prophecy, showing the widespread desire for greater light on this most vital of all topics. Here is an opportunity for every one who is interested in the prophetic writings to get the light they need. And we feel that they will welcome these revelations, for Dr. Patch, the author of "Prophecy Explained," is not a sensational writer, nor an alarmist, but a sound and reverent Christian scholar, who diffuses comfort, encouragement and consolation in all he writes.

1 Vol. 12mo. Cloth
(size, 7½x5 inches)

400 Pages of Large Type

Some Notable Passages from the Book

"THE KINGDOM OF HEAVEN"

"Jesus told us about the kingdom of Heaven, not the Kingdom in Heaven. We are to pray 'Thy Kingdom come'—not to be taken to it. 'Thy will be done in earth as it is in heaven.' It is a heavenly—Heaven like Kingdom, on earth. We are told to lay up treasures in heaven, that our reward is in heaven, that our inheritance and citizenship are in heaven, and our names are written in heaven. But Jesus said, 'Behold, I come quickly, and my reward is with me to give'—etc. We do not go to heaven to get our rewards, he brings them to us. The city in which we hope to have citizenship is 'coming down out of heaven.'"

THE "EVIL AGE" AND "AGE OF PEACE"

"The climax of all these economic changes seems to have been reached in the recent world carnage. To all who have eyes to see and ears to hear, it must be evident that God is moving as never before and bringing about these tremendous changes for some specific purpose. We have no means of knowing what his purpose is, except as He has revealed it in His Word. From this Word we learn that an age of peace and plenty, prosperity and blessedness, is to come after 'this present evil age,' which is to end in disaster and judgment. It is equally evident that all these economic changes must be preparing the world for the conditions which are to prevail in that age of blessing."

"THE NEW EARTH"

"That the whole earth is to be melted and dissipated by fire is not absolutely to be inferred from any passage in the Bible. Peter prefaces his statements about the coming of the new heaven and earth by saying that 'the world that then was'—(before the flood)—'perished.' . . . 'being overflowed with water.' But the heavens that now are, and the earth—a new heavens and earth after the flood—have been stored up for fire. A world cleansed by water, and its heaven, or atmosphere, became thereby a new heaven and earth. And they will again become new in a similar sense when cleansed by fire. Such a heaven and earth, with Satan cast out of both, would correspond with the new heaven and new earth of Isa. 65: 17."

"Fire, in the Bible, usually means literal fire, but it is also used in a figurative sense. . . . The recent wars and famines and pestilences have been sweeping like fires—great conflagrations—over the old world. The fires of this lesson are, therefore, probably literal, unless it be that the 'lake of fire' is figurative."

"The passing away of the heaven and earth of Rev. 21: 1 seems to be the closing up of the millennial age and order, and beginning of a new order. This is what Paul refers to in I Cor. 15: 24: 'Then cometh the end, when he shall deliver up the Kingdom to God, even the Father.' The fleeing away of the heaven and earth of Rev. 20: 11 seems to imply their embarrassment in that glorious Presence. They fade into insignificance before Him."

I help YOUNG MEN make MORE MONEY

I make a business of helping young men succeed. Every year thousands come or write to me—

"How can I make more money? I want a better job—better pay—a better future."

Money! Money! More MONEY!

Ambitious men want to advance. Young men want to get started in trades and businesses which pay well. All want to live well—to be happy, prosperous, SUCCESSFUL.

"Know how to do some one thing well," I tell them. "Be a trained man. Learn by actually doing, under competent instructors, the work you would like most to do. Become an expert. Then dig in and work hard, save, and be independent, SUCCESSFUL."

Real Training for Ambitious Men

Fourteen years ago I began helping young men make more money. At Kansas City, Mo., I opened the Rahe Auto and Tractor School. I decided to make it an outstanding institution of learning—a place where ambitious men who do not have time to go to college can prepare for life, at relatively small cost. For I felt that every young man should have a chance for schooling that would directly increase his income. And he should be taught quickly—in 6 to 8 weeks. The school grew. In all, I have four large buildings at Kansas City.

Now Three Big Rahe Schools

Last year I decided I must further enlarge. Either more floor space at Kansas City, or establish new schools. Why not, I thought, take the Rahe-Way of Auto and Tractor training hundreds of miles closer to young men who could not come to Kansas City? The idea proved sound. I established the Cincinnati school—not a branch, but an independent, full-fledged Auto and Tractor School, teaching the famous Rahe-Way. From the day it opened its doors it has been a success. Hundreds of young men have trained there. The new Chicago School has just opened—it is ready now to teach the Rahe-Way to the thousands of young men in Chicago's big territory who have wanted for years to equip themselves with this practical training for life.

Billions Paid Yearly for Motor Upkeep

Three Billion Dollars, it is estimated, will be spent this year on motor upkeep. Few persons realize this—few think of the auto and tractor repair service and the general garage business as one of the largest in the country. Yet it is. And it is a steady, stable business. No layoffs or depressions, for the millions of motor cars and tractors in use must be kept in condition. There is this about it, too. Every year the cars already in use grow older. As they age they need more care. Of the Three Billion Dollars a big part goes to the owners of garages and their assistants.

Own a Profitable Business

This is my advice to ambitious young men, the fellows who want to get ahead, to be independent. Equip yourself the Rahe-Way. Learn Auto and Tractor mechanics thoroughly. Be an expert. Then pick your job from the many openings available when you leave my school. Go to work, and work hard. You will make good money, mighty good money for a young man. SAVE a good part of these earnings, put them away in the bank. In a year or so you may be independent—in a position to start a garage of your own. Not a large one right away perhaps, but if you know how to give good service, your business will grow. In time you will be making—well, you will set your own income. Garage owners make as high as $50,000 a year, others plug along making $3,000 or $4,000. It is all up to the man—his training, how hard he will work, his ability to save, his ambition and his initiative.

Learn Motors Under RAHE Masters

But I want you to remember this. Thorough training pays. And the way to get this training is to work under the Master Mechanics in a Rahe School. I have spent fourteen years of my life training these Master Instructors to train YOU. I have rolled up my sleeves to take apart engines. I like to work with power machinery, just as any real man does. And so I keep in touch at all times with the training given in each one of the departments. Here is what you get under the Rahe Life Scholarship—complete Automobile and Tractor Training, including Transmissions, Engine Assembly, Starting and Lighting Systems, Storage Batteries, Carburetion, "Trouble Shooting," Welding and Cutting, Forging and Soldering, Vulcanizing, Tire Repair, Rebuilding and Retreading, Complete Machine Shop Practice, Special Ford work, Special Truck and Tractor instruction.

Rahe Auto & Tractor Schools

Are you anxious, impatient, eager to get into big pay work—to be happy, prosperous, SUCCESSFUL. Do you feel that you can hardly wait for a big pay position. Are you really ambitious.

Water, Wind and Wear-Proof— What else could an Overcoat be?

AND really, isn't that all you want to know about an overcoat—if only you can be sure that these things are true?

"But how can these things be proved?" you ask. Well, today you need take nothing on faith, and especially this overcoat, for it's Clothcraft made—made by the manufacturers of Clothcraft Serge Specials, which have more satisfied wearers than perhaps any other suits in the world.

This overcoat is Clothcraft's Anniversary Special, the unusual value planned in honor of Clothcraft's seventy-five years of quality clothes-making.

Add to this experience of three generations, Clothcraft's unqualified guarantee that it will give satisfactory wear and service, and you gain a true conception not only of the pride we have in the product, but in the service it will assuredly give you.

It sheds rain like a duck. It is heavy enough to protect against a blizzard. It is of such exceptional weight and firmness that for enduring wear it cannot be surpassed.

Now add to these facts just one more—that through specialized production on only four models and the development of many "shortcut" processes in manufacturing, Clothcraft has been able to cut costs to rock-bottom—and you have the reasons why the Clothcraft Anniversary Overcoat Special is the biggest overcoat value of the year. You have only to glance through the descriptions of the four models pictured below to realize that here at last is an overcoat of the style you want and the sturdiness you want. It is a man's coat, with no "gingerbread" or "jazz" about it—just a good honest, common-sense coat that a man knows will look well on him and will wear like iron.

To give you an idea of the kind of cloth used in this overcoat, a special folder containing actual swatches, has been prepared; it helps you feel that you are taking nothing for granted when buying your new overcoat. Just ask for one of these swatch folders—it will cost you nothing, and places you under no obligation. Write today to The Joseph & Feiss Co., 2166 West 53rd Street, Cleveland, O.

Y 75. Young men will like this medium long ulsterette model. Long enough to keep out the cold and rain, but smart enough for wear at any time and any place. Protective storm collar, belted back, with vent, rolling lapels, double breasted, every accepted style touch. $27.50.

Y 85. A young man's overcoat model combining the features of the extra warm all-weather ulster, with those of the dressier overcoat. Of medium length, double breasted, with soft roll lapels and high ulster collar. The all-around belt is a distinctly young man addition. $30.00.

M 50. The water-wind-wear-proof coat is made also in a man's conservative button-through overcoat. This coat has a slightly shaped back, with vent, and a collar of the same material. $26.00.

Reconciliation, a Basis of World Peace

A Stirring Plea for a New Spirit in International Relations

IN THE early part of the war a young English officer on the night preceding his death in battle, wrote in his last letter to his father: "Having been about all night digging, I was shifted to make room for some other company. I advanced to a cemetery to defend it, and stayed there most of the day. It is a beastly thing to have to do, digging trenches among graves and pulling down crosses and ornamental wreaths to make room. One feels that something is wrong when a man lies down behind a child's grave to shoot at a bearded German who has probably got a family, anxiously waiting his return home. It was a miserable day, wet, and spent in a cemetery under those conditions. There was a large crucifix at one end. The sight of the bullets chipping Christ's image about, and the knowledge of what He has done for us and the Germans, and what we were doing to His consecrated ground and each other, made me feel sick of the whole war or sicker than before."

The men at the front felt that something was wrong and often said so in plain words, like this poor boy. I think most of us feel it now. We all learned in our childhood Southey's poem about the Battle of Blenheim, with the child's unanswered and unanswerable question, "And what good came of it at last?" said little Wilhelmine." We knew it, of course, and I never met any one who wished for war, with Germany or any other country; but we were told that the country never fight, that there was no help for it. The people of all the other belligerent countries were told the same thing, and so millions of men, who a week before were absorbed in their peaceful work and play in their quiet homes, with their families around them, were hurled against each other for four years of scientific butchery. We need not now apportion the guilt. It is as Europeans, as Christians, as civilized men that we are all called to penitence, a penitence in which we may find the path to reconciliation.

THE young officer's words recall that unforgettable paragraph in Sartor Resartus. "There dwell and toil in the British village of Dumdrudge some five hundred souls. From these, by certain natural enemies of the French, there are selected during the French war say thirty able-bodied men. Dumdrudge . . . has trained them to crafts, so that one can weave and another build, another hammer. Nevertheless, among much weeping and swearing, they are selected; all dressed in red; and shipped away at the public charge, say to the South of Spain, and kept there until they are wanted. And now to that same spot in the South of Spain are thirty similar French artisans; from a French Dumdrudge, in like manner wending. . . . The word 'Fire' is given, and they blow the souls out of one another, and in place of sixty brisk, useful craftsmen, the world has sixty dead carcasses, which it must bury and shed tears for. Had these men any quarrel?"

The war, while it lasted, seemed to have been caused by the deliberate wickedness of an abstract demon called Germany. The Germans were more or less honestly persuaded that similar abstractions called Russia and England were the criminals. Now it seems to most of us that we were all stark mad together. The chief obstacle to penitence is indeed the suspicion that none of the parties concerned was responsible for its actions. The utter futility and folly of modern war had often been demonstrated. Wars are waged, I suppose, for territory or for plunder or for trade. As for the first, nothing weakens a country more than unwilling subjects. The Poles have been an unmitigated nuisance to the three empires which partitioned their territory, and it has yet to be proved that we should not be much better off if we could clear out of the Turkish Empire. As for indemnities, I have it on good authority that Bismarck declared that if he made another successful war one of the terms of peace would be that Germany should pay a large indemnity to the losers.

By W. R. INGE

(The Very Rev. Dean of St. Paul's, London)

As for the tropical possessions, let any one estimate the value to us of the tropics and all the negroes who inhabit them, and compare the total with what the war cost us. A sane man does not pay £10,000 a year in fire insurance for a haystack.

I CAN NOT admit that to demonstrate the economic lunacy of war is to appeal to low motives. That is sheer cant. National bankruptcy means wide-spread unemployment, starving children with pinched faces and legs like broomsticks; it means civil war and revolution; it means the relapse of civilization into barbarism, since it is the most highly educated classes—as we see everywhere in Europe—who are first ruined.

AS THE Washington Conference on Limitation of Armaments opens, the hopes of the world are centered on lasting peace. Dean Inge, one of England's most eloquent and most scholarly clergymen, herewith presents a moving arraignment of the cruelty and futility of war and a plea for reconciliation among the nations. In expressing his detestation of war, he is finding words for the sentiment of a great part of the British people; and it is this sentiment, shared by the people of every land, which gives the strongest ground for the expectation that in Washington there will be some definite accomplishments toward permanent pacification.

Well, perhaps the business community will not again make the mistake of thinking that war can ever be good business. Even the press, I am told, has found that it is very bad business from its point of view. But the liability to attacks of war fever is so great, and the irrationality of human beings so intractable that we can not rely only on appeals to common sense. The moral appeal must come first, if for no other reason, because the war spirit makes a successful appeal to the idealist, as well as to the self-regarding. As Canon Grace says, it was the moral effect of an obscure monk's self-sacrifice which brought the bloody games of the Coliseum to an end. And the emancipation of the slave was won, not by proving that free labor would produce more sugar and more cotton than the cowhide lash, but by persuading public opinion that slavery as an institution involved horrors which were an outrage on humanity and an insult to God.

The moral appeal just now must mainly take the form of penitence and the spirit of reconciliation. Europe has deep cause for penitence. Do we realize these two things: first, that the relations of civilized mankind all over Europe and its colonies had become so close, that this war was at least as much a civil war as the chronic wars between the various cantons of ancient Greece? And, secondly, that after a century of growing humanity, a century which prided itself on safeguarding the rights of the lower animals to decent treatment, the nations of Europe were no sooner locked in the death-grapple than horrors and atrocities were committed, which ten or a hundred or even two thousand years ago would have been thought incredible except in savage warfare!

IF THIS seems to you too strong, let me quote a few sentences from the "Republic" of Plato in which Socrates lays down what seemed to him to be reasonable and practicable rules for the conduct of war between Greek states. I have just said that the civilized world is quite as much bound together by common traditions and habits and convictions as were the Greek states, so that the comparison is a fair one.

"Do you think it right," asks Socrates, "that Greeks should enslave Greeks, considering the danger that all Greece is in of barbarian conquest? Clearly, no Greek should make a slave of another Greek. Then we must abstain from spoiling the dead or hindering their burial. Neither shall we offer up trophies in the temples of the gods, fearing that the offering of trophies taken from kinsmen may be a pollution. Again, we shall not devastate the land of Greek enemies, nor burn their houses, without injuring the next harvest."

This is pagan war-morality, 2300 years ago. Think of this, you who have seen northeastern France! And now it is widely assumed that if there is another war, each side will try to exterminate the women and children of the other by poison! I can not altogether account for this outbreak of diabolism, but while such things are done and justified, the less we talk about progress the better.

This reversion to savagery is not mainly the result of the new inventions. It is as easy to murder a child with a spear or club as with a bomb. But until seven years ago such things were not done.

In part, no doubt, these horrors are the result of the elaborately engineered propaganda of hatred which all the belligerents employed, knowing that the average man needs some incitement to kill his fellow man. This is one of the most devilish parts of the whole business. The soldiers were told untrue stories of the outrages committed by the other side. Furious hatred and indignation were artificially stimulated. Even religion was freely dragged in. One side appealed to their good old ally, God; the other represented the war as a "struggle between Corsica and Calvary." Alas, the spirit of the Corsican was not hovering over one army only. So the minds of the belligerents were systematically poisoned by their own governments, and the deadly spirit of hatred thus generated has been slow to subside.

To quote Canon Grace again, "Long after Nature has hidden with her kindly cloak the ghastly evidence of inhuman strife, the unseen spirit of war-engendered hate continues to embitter the national heart, exciting rancor in the defeated and arrogance in the victorious, poisoning in both the natural wells of fraternity and peace."

And then we think of the peace. The victors had to consider whether they wished to make an end of war, knowing as we all know, that another war in our time would destroy our civilization utterly; or whether they wished to make a vindictive peace which the losers would think themselves more than justified in tearing up at the first opportunity. If we wished the former, we ought to have offered to the Germans terms which they themselves would have thought unexpectedly generous, and then to have said to them, "Now we have given you no excuse for plotting revenge; join us in establishing a league of nations and universal disarmament and let us all help each other to gather up the fragments that remain."

We say that the Germans showed no sign of repentance. Did we make it easy for them to repent? The human heart is like water; it freezes at a certain temperature and melts under the influence of warmth. The Christian method is to overcome evil with good. It does not always succeed, but the opposite method, of driving out devils by Beelzebub, invariably fails.

So far as I can gather from those who have lately traveled in Germany, the Germans are rather less bitter and fierce than we should be if we had met with the same treatment. But I should not like to build upon this. The French are leaving no stone unturned to provoke a violent militaristic reaction in Germany; they may have terrible cause to regret this suicidal policy. But I have no wish to discuss politics. I merely point out the obvious fact that if one of a pair of gamblers won and exacted full payment of a heavy stake, and then said: "Now we will play for love for the rest of the evening," his proposal is not likely to find favor with the loser.

My own opinion is that the peace threatens civilization with worse ruin than even the war.

It is an appalling state of things, and what should our feelings be when we turn from our Bibles to the visions of the prophets and the promise of the Incarnation. "O that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments! Then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea." The crowning title of the coming deliverer in Isaiah's prophecy was, the Prince of Peace, "Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end." "Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

The happy vision seemed to be near its fulfillment in the Angel's song, "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good-will toward men." Alas, another passage in the Gospel comes to our minds: "If thou hadst known even thou, in this day, the things that belong to thy peace, but now they are hid from thine eyes."

BUT if it please God, it is not yet too late. The gate of repentance is not yet shut. We have all sinned and suffered together; we may all repent together. We may help to bear one another's burdens, not only by relieving the necessities of those who are suffering most, but by bearing one another's moral burdens.

We English are a continental people, and some of us, in our reaction from the hatred fostered during the War, and our shame at having given way to the absurd idea that every one who has the misfortune to be born between the Rhine and the Vistula has a double dose of original sin, have rushed to the other extreme and speak as if the Germans were amiable and injured innocents. That will not do at all. They have as much to repent of as we have; indeed I think much more, but we must help them to show their best selves by showing them our best selves.

Justice, common-sense and good-will are the qualities which are needed; not sentimentality. The spirit of civilization would say to us all, "Sirs, we are brethren, why do ye wrong one another?"

We are brethren, we Europeans; if one member suffers, all the members suffer with it. We have discovered this to our great cost in the economic sphere; we must learn it also in the moral sphere. We can not afford a humiliated, embittered and desperate Germany any more than a triumphant, militaristic Germany. The harmony of the European symphony needs the best tones of all its members; and who, after all, are the typical Germans—Goethe, Schiller, Kant, Beethoven, or the Slavs, Nietzsche and Treitschke, and the Englishman, Houston Stewart Chamberlain?

The Shadows We Cast

They May Be Larger and More Impressive Than We Think

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE shadows we cast—they're often a great deal more revealing than we imagine. They show things that we are able to hide by a shade of expression or a smile or a flicker of eyelashes. Sometimes they hold great disappointments and sometimes, as in the case of the man, they are wonderfully reassuring!

Oftentimes we can't help being a bit negative—a shade commonplace. Oftentimes it's shyness that keeps us down in a fixed place—occasionally it's the strength of environment that binds us with heavy chains. But even shyness and environment and a hundred and one other problems that confront us are unable to limit or curb the shadows that we cast.

The shadows, mind you, don't have to be silhouettes thrown upon a plaster wall or a blank screen. They can be other, more detached, things. They can be less tangible. As in the case of Clara White:

Clara White was the plainest sort of a girl. And apparently the most ordinary. And yet the shadow that she cast was a magnificent one.

It all happened during the great war, when Clara began to write letters. Letters to soldiers and sailors, they were; letters to boys who were decidedly lacking in families and home ties. The letters were not flirtatious notes, or shallow compositions, or indefinite bits of writing—they were warm, throbbing ties that, I believe, held many a man close to his faith in the best things of life. Utterly personal, they were and yet so gloriously impersonal that they didn't ever assume the proportions of an adventure. They were the reflections of a spirit—they were the shadows of a soul—the soul of all good women, rather than the soul of one girl!

All through the war Clara White wrote her letters. And when the war was over she kept on writing, until she knew that her correspondents were safely home. And then—the need being over—she stopped. And the boys never knew her. But I am sure that her memory will ever be enshrined in their hearts.

With the need over, Clara White stopped writing. But it was not long before other needs came to her. There was a girl missionary in a far-off province of China—a lonely girl struggling with a great and difficult task. There was a physician who was living among the lepers. There was a young man working his way through a certain theological seminary. And there was a woman—tired with life's battle—who spent the long days in a wheel-chair by an open city window. These, and many more, came to know Clara White through her messages. And every one of them loved her with a sincere and touching devotion. If they had met her they might never have known her hidden beauty, the unsounded depths of her mind, the reaching out of her personality. But the shadow that she cast told her story—told it in a more detailed way than she herself could have expressed it.

WE ARE not—many of us—able to help in as definite and concrete a way as Clara White was able to help. And yet there are means by which we can cast our shadows to a great and glowing advantage. We can gain the admiration and esteem and—best of all—the love of many people by the splendor, the truthfulness, the sincerity of the shadows that we cast.

Whether we mean to or not we are bound to cast shadows. Just as a person placed between a light and a blank wall can not help making a silhouette, so we—placed between the light of circumstance and the wall of life—can not help projecting shadows. And sometimes the shadows that we project are very much to our credit—and sometimes, regrettably, they aren't. But—whether they're to our credit or not—they can't be ignored or successfully concealed.

Sometimes very few people will notice the shadows that we cast—but that's because they aren't observing, not because the shadows aren't in plain sight for the world to gaze upon. And sometimes the shadows are so compelling that a multitude will pause to look at them. Sometimes the shadows may fall close to us—and stay there through all of the years. And sometimes they will travel thousands of miles—will cross oceans and mountain ranges and desert wastes.

Clara White's shadow traveled many thousands of miles, and is still traveling. And—God willing—it will continue to travel for a number of decades. But there are other shadows—silhouettes with much of power and glory and sweetness—that have fallen like a benediction upon neighboring walls, and near-by lives. And they have as much value—of a different sort, perhaps, but just as real—as the shadows that go out on great missions and knightly quests.

HE WAS a small man—slim and boyish and a trifle stooped. He would have fitted into any crowd without drawing the attention of a soul; when he walked into a hotel lobby or a great railroad station or a drawing-room he passed quite unnoticed. So commonplace he was, in appearance, that he was often almost ignored—sometimes entirely forgotten. One never thought of him as a distinct personality—he was just "among those present" and nothing more. Indeed, he had never made any particular impression upon me until one evening when we met—quite by chance—at a reception. And because I was a stranger in the place and he, also, knew very few people, we settled down into a corner to talk. For an acquaintance, even a casual acquaintance, is a veritable haven of refuge in a room full of alien folk.

Quite by chance we sat down together in a corner that was lighted softly yet brilliantly by a number of candles. And also, quite by chance, the man placed himself so that he was between a row of the candles and a wide white expanse of wall. And so it happened that his profile, as he talked earnestly to me, was thrown in bold relief upon the wall. And as he moved and spoke and gesticulated the profile shifted and became a massive, exceedingly impressive silhouette.

It fascinated me, that silhouette. There was something powerful about it—a latent virility that I had never suspected in the man's face. The line of the forehead was a high, noble one; the nose was well chiselled; the chin firm and splendidly high. Covertly I glanced from the shadow of the face—just as covertly I glanced back again. And I was surprised to see that as a portrait it was decidedly accurate. The man's forehead was good and so was his nose. The chin was a chin to be proud of.

It seemed curious to one that those good points had passed unnoticed—that I had ever thought him commonplace or neutral or one of the crowd. The silhouette upon the wall showed lines of purpose and ability and idealism. I found that I was making new comparisons as I watched it—that I was forming new opinions.

I found that I was more interested in the man's conversation—that I was almost eager to know his thoughts upon many a subject. When we got up finally to leave the corner I felt that I had made a new friend. And though the man was actually as undersized as ever—though he was just as stooped and boyish—I was conscious of his place in the world, of his character and his individuality.

Where the God Hari Set His Feet

A Visit to One of the Most Sacred of India's Holy Places

By REV. W. B. NORTON, Ph.D.

WHEN the Hindus give up their foolish notions about their gods, they will think of their present teachings just as the Greeks and Romans under the teachings of Christianity finally came to think of their old mythology. Theories of what the gods did and said will still be used as illustrations to point lessons in morality and wisdom. Not a little of this habit of illustration has been and still is used by Christian ministers. To slip from the actual worship of the gods into a poetical sentiment in regard to them is the easy and natural way for a people to pass from mythology to reality, from legend to history.

This process is now going on in India. The better educated among the Indians who still cling to the Hindu religion and yet who can not fail to see its absurdities under the light not only of Christianity but of science are beginning to explain these absurdities by the allegorical method. In fact Lajpat Rai, one of the modern living apologists for Hinduism who is well educated in Western science, literature and history as studied at Oxford, England, and at Columbia University in the United States and is active in the political nationalist movement in India, urges that this method of the evolution of thought will be sufficient to maintain a faith in the old religions of the Vedas while still accepting the results of the most advanced Western science.

Those who believe in the certain ultimate triumph of Christianity—and I am one of those who do so believe—regard the change of belief in the literal power and presence of the gods to a mere poetical sentiment in regard to them as evidence of the disintegration of the old idolatry. No great people can guide their lives through the maze of temptations such as is common to men or face the certainty of the grave and eternity supported only by the imaginings of fancy. There must be something as solid as the Rock of Ages for their feet to rest on. In Hardwar we find this strange mixture of superstitious faith in the ancient legends on the part of the many and an attempt on the part of the few to explain by legend the Hindu love of the beautiful and romantic in nature.

THE word, Hardwar, is pronounced as though divided and spelled Hur-draw and means "the door of Hur." It is the door through which the god, Hari, Har, or Hur, is believed by the Hindus to have come from the summits of the snow-crowned Himalayas into the vast plain of the Ganges. The bathing place in the Ganges River at Hardwar is said to be the exact spot where the god placed his feet when he made the first step after coming down the mountains. It is one of the most sacred of the many sacred resorts of India, and aside from its heathenish practices is as charming as river and mountain can make it.

We made the trip from Roorki to Hardwar, a distance of nineteen miles, by automobile, traveling all the way on the bank of the Ganges canal, one of the triumphs of British engineering skill in making provision for the irrigation of millions of acres of agricultural land and insuring a vast population against the possibility of famine, even though the monsoon should fail in certain years.

The building of the canal, which draws its water from the Ganges, was attended by the difficulties which follow when modern science comes in direct antagonism with an ancient superstitious faith. It was the same kind of a conflict which Galileo met when he discovered proof that the world was round and moved around the sun, while the church held to the ancient belief that the sun did the moving while the world stood still.

When the Hindus learned that mother Ganges was to be desecrated by British unbelievers, a great outcry was made. Disaster to the canal project was predicted. When a bridge was to be built over the Ganges at Cawnpore the priests said the river would rise and carry the bridge away on her bosom. So serious became the opposition and so apparently sincere was the belief in the impending danger that ten princes of native blood called on the British authorities, promising that if the canal would be abandoned they would repay all the expense the government had incurred. After all offers had been rejected by the British, who had the material interests of the people at heart and who felt as do fathers and mothers that they must do some things the children can not at present understand but will be thankful for hereafter, the day came for opening the gates of the canal and letting in the water from the Ganges. It was said that 500,000 gathered to witness the ceremony. The priests had promised the discomfiture of the sacrilegious British. The people waited with expectancy. The gates lifted. The sacred water of the Ganges obeyed the law of gravitation and flowed into its artificial channel with eagerness and grace. No harm came. The canal was a complete success. With consternation and finally with dismay because of shattered faith in the priests and even in mother Ganges herself, the disappointed Hindu multitudes uttered a despairing wail and departed for their homes. The multiplication of such scenes in railroad, factory, water system and city illumination is among the factors which are working for a truer interpretation of nature as servant and not master of men.

WHEN we reached Hardwar and were proceeding with American directness and speed to visit at once the bathing pool and the fakirs, tap, tap, tap went a cane sharply on the stone pavement. The the food and the flowers as offerings by which merit would be acquired and store laid up in heaven.

The sacred bulls and cows mingled with the throng. You could rub them on their noses, if you wanted to pet them, but no one would dare to harm them in the least. They had the right of way, as they do everywhere in India. In going over a narrow bridge which leads to an island my wife had hard work in crowding between two of these sacred animals, for holiness does not diminish their bulk.

Naked fakirs were present in large numbers. Some were sitting, receiving the homage of the pilgrims who were paying money to the fakirs and receiving from them amulets or other cheap trinkets whose worth had been increased by their being blessed. One woman we watched was well dressed in a sari of spotless white richly embroidered and of fine texture. She had a sweet, pure face and seemed most devout. She made an offering to one of the fakirs, received her trifling gift in return and moved away with a look akin to rapture. I will not assume the omniscience to judge her heart or determine the way in which God will judge her evidently sincere intentions. I would not wonder if she received more of the divine favor than the skeptic who withholds all worship except that bestowed upon himself.

Hindu protector of the sacred places pointed first at the pavement, then at our feet, and then gestured with his cane, making it plain without our understanding his words, that our shoes could not touch that particular spot. We learned by inquiry of a missionary who could understand the language that the place was holy and no one could pass over it without taking off his shoes. Moreover, we learned that we could not pass over it at all, because it led directly to the bathing place for women which no man, Hindu or Christian, could approach. As far as seeing the bathing was concerned, the prohibition was no hindrance, for the women were bathing in full view of every one. The women covered themselves from head to feet with thin white saris of cotton or muslin as they went in and came out of the water. It was an attempt, although a rather unsuccessful one, at modesty. No woman, it was said, could bathe with her face covered, as in purdah. A certain Rajah, whose several wives practiced purdah, keeping themselves always veiled, paid for the privilege of having his wives bathe without uncovering their faces the sum of 3,000 rupees a day and a gift of 5 rupees apiece to every holy man in addition to special offerings he might make at the various temples.

One of the queer sights which, it would seem, would be too much even for persons usually credulous was the practice of having men standing in the Ganges with nets fishing up the pieces of jewelry and other offerings which the women had thrown in as tribute to the gods. One could see a woman devotee throw in her offering and see the man stand in the water and fish it out. We were told the fishers paid well for this privilege.

FEEDING the sacred fish was another curiosity. A priest would throw into the water balls of food, looking like moth balls, and the fish would jump out of the water for them. Then the fish would swim in shoals until the surface of the water looked like solid fish. Of course, it was the privilege of any one to buy

MANY were carrying water away from the Ganges to take it to their home for sacramental purposes. Some had small bags around their necks which it was explained contained the ashes of their dead relatives which they were to scatter on the surface of the Ganges. The priests mingled freely with the people and instructed them for a price, as to the proper methods of worship and the order in which the various shrines were to be visited. The priests all wore saffron-colored robes and a consciousness of the value of harmony of attire was apparent in some of them, for they carried saffron-colored umbrellas and wore slippers of the same shade, while others went barefoot and either were without umbrellas or carried those of ordinary black or white.

A shrine was pointed out to us way up the mountain-side which it was said Rudyard Kipling had visited when he was here. We were told that we could see his autograph, if we would make the climb. It was interesting, but the hour was late and we could not stay long enough to make the ascent. Pilgrims are sent on this and a dozen still more difficult climbs, after paying a fee for the suggestion, by which they acquire merit.

The population varies from 25,000 to 500,000 according to the importance of the festivals celebrated, but ever and always the bathing places are filled and long lines of pilgrims are seen on the highway, as we saw them, going and coming, some of them walking hundreds and in exceptional cases thousands of miles, for it is an opportunity coveted by every Hindu to bathe at least once in the waters of the holy Ganges.

This is due to their belief that whoever dies on its banks, and drinks of its waters before his death, is exempted from the necessity of returning into this world and beginning a new life. When, therefore, a sick person who lives near the Ganges has been given up as hopeless of recovery by his physician, his relatives hasten to carry him to the banks of the river in order that he may drink of the holy water or be bathed in its waters before he dies.

Naturally such scenes do not make a cheerful impression on the spectator, particularly one from the Occident who is interested in pointing out to India's crowded tens of millions the true road to salvation.

Several Christian missions are maintained at Hardwar, and the workers there carry on vigorous campaigns of preaching, personal evangelism and tract distribution. Although the town is not large, it is a strategic center of great importance to the missionaries because of the number of pilgrims who make up the continual procession and who, if they can be reached by the missionary efforts, will carry the message of Christianity back to remote villages.

At the spring equinox one of the largest fairs of all India is held at Hardwar, and every twelfth year there is a gathering which draws pilgrims and traders by the hundreds of thousands. To many of those who have painfully made their way in years past to such assemblages, the pilgrimage has been a source of grief instead of benefit, for medical authorities have held that these assemblages were a potent factor in the spread of cholera, which formerly took such a heavy toll in India.

Armament or Disarmament

THE Conference on Limitation of Armament will be of very little practical value to mankind, if the personnel of the Conference come together in a spirit of mutual suspicion and distrust. The one greatest factor in war has been fear. When fear is wedded to suspicion it is almost impossible to work against prejudice. It is therefore the hope in the hearts of the people who really want war to cease, that at this meeting of the great nations all the delegates act as if the purpose of the Conference was an honest attempt on the part of their respective countries to do away with unnecessary war armament.

The delegates and representatives will be under tremendous pressure from the military and diplomatic forces to present national claims to territory, or even extension of military equipment on account of conditions that each representative will emphasize. But it would be the greatest irony of history if a conference called to discuss the ways and means to curtail war expenses should degenerate into a struggle on the part of the countries represented for MORE power to meet a feared future.

That such a thing is possible is shown by the editorials already appearing in journals published in America, England and France. Here is a quotation from a recent interview credited to a French statesman: "Germany is and always will be a standing menace to France. We cannot relax our vigilance against our old enemy. We need and must have an increasingly powerful military equipment to guard the future."

Then why not call the coming conference by the right name and say "The ARMAMENT Conference." That is what it will be, unless the real object of it is constantly emphasized.

The diplomats and militarists have ruled statecraft so long that it is difficult for other kinds of people to get a hearing. The average American citizen, the man who works for a living and does not know any more about diplomacy than he does about golf, is sick of paying Mars's board bills and wearing his cannon-balls around the ankle every day as he walks down to the shop. It is time he had a hearing. If the delegates at the Conference table were made up of average plain citizens like John Jones, the man on duty at the fire station drawing eighty dollars a month, and Henry Robinson, the mail carrier who works for the government for almost enough to pay his grocer and the landlord, the Conference would not last long, and when it was over there would be some real disarmament.

Really the first thing to disarm is the man who will try to crowd up to the table and intimidate the representatives with the century-old talk about the need of "preparation," and "hereditary enemies," and "national honor," and who will inject "fear" and "suspicion" and "jealousy" and even "hate" into the discussion.

For our own part, here in the United States for more than a quarter of a century there has been a steady propaganda going on to create a spirit of ill-will against Japan. That spirit will sit close at the table of discussion unless the spirit of good-will prevails. It is altogether probable that within the last twenty-five years more lies have been told about Japan's warlike intentions towards the United States than about anything else except the true state of things in Ireland. Fear and distrust and hate have been sown and the crop has been prolific in more militarism and more cannon balls around the legs of John Jones and Henry Robinson.

Yet Japan, at the last meeting of the League of Nations held in Geneva, sent in this recommendation:

"No peace can last without cultural bases, without the national co-ordination of the cultural heritage and outlook of each people with the rest—the co-ordination that will do away with ignorance and prejudices.

"But as we look critically into the prevailing education in each nation we see all sorts of old prejudice still wittingly or unwittingly inculcated into innocent souls. The education of people, we dare say, is still predominantly influenced by national egoism. So long as this egoism is allowed to persist, all other efforts toward peace and understanding, we are afraid, will be of no permanent value.

"We cannot, therefore, too strongly insist that without an international organization of educational influences, which shall effectively counteract all the hidden forces tending toward imperialism and militarism, no league of nations can possibly attain its object."

It is, of course, probable that the average diplomat will put his tongue in his cheek and sneer at this as a part of Japan's national scheme to hoodwink the nations as to her "sinister" intentions. But John Jones and Henry Robinson, who still have some faith in mankind's honesty of purpose, will take such statements as expressing the best mind of Japan.

One of the great questions therefore that ought to be asked and answered before the Conference sits, is this:

Are the plain people of the world going to have something to say about the results of the Conference?

Are John Jones and Henry Robinson going to have some influence in the discussion, or is it to be led by the same old crowd of war-makers and fear-makers and hate-makers?

Is the Conference going to be dominated by those who make a living out of war, or by those who lose their living by it?

Human Side of Big Problems

FEW men are qualified to go right to the heart of a big public problem as Secretary Hoover did a few days ago in a message to a national conference of editors of business publications in Chicago. He told them that the most direct way to deal with the great problems we are now facing is to regard them as human questions and not as they affected mere material. "We are dealing," he wrote, "with questions of railways, farms, shops, and of instruments of commerce and industry, but in the background of every person's mind there is the fact that we are dealing not with mechanical things, but that we are concerned with the problems of men, women and children."

Applying these principles, we find that far above the matter of wages and earnings in public importance is the fact that a strike which, overleaping the bounds of the interests immediately affected, would inflict suffering and hardship upon multitudes who have neither voice nor power in the case, would make in the highest sense a "human problem" of the kind whose injustice must be apparent to all. There can be no right to strike, or to grant irresponsibility, when a nation's welfare is involved. This policy, it is explained, is wholly outside of any question of the merits on either side. It is simply to assure the country that if the roads and the men are bound to strike, it must be seen to that the innocent are not made to suffer. And this is dealing with the problem in its purely human aspect, which is the only way to set matters right and to avert injustice.

AN APPEAL

To the Members of the Christian Herald Prayer League

THE Bowery Mission is greatly in need of funds. The regular work of the Mission has been so widely extended during recent years that a largely increased expense has naturally been incurred. In addition, there has arisen, somewhat suddenly, the overwhelming task of providing for the great host of needy and destitute, but thoroughly deserving, unemployed men who are now daily and nightly clamoring at the Mission doors.

Never has the spiritual work of the Mission been more marvelously blessed than it is at the present time.

The Mission is the central clearing house of the Christian Herald Prayer League. Meetings are held every week evening and twice on Sunday, and at each meeting you are remembered in prayer. Many thousands of you have sent in special requests for prayer, which have been held up at the Throne of Grace at the services, and many, very many, have received direct and bountiful answers.

The M'dnight Bread Line that has saved untold lives in the past, but which, owing to abundance of employment, became unnecessary during war time, will be opened again on Thanksgiving morning. This is imperative and inevitable, and it involves the Mission in huge expense. Out of gratitude for blessings received through the Prayer League will you not help this work of feeding your starving brethren by sending in a money contribution?

If every member of the League would give the small sum of fifty cents ample funds for carrying on the work for another year would be forthcoming.

Money orders and checks should be sent to the Treasurer, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

JOHN C. HALLIMOND,
Superintendent.

Horseshoes

THE old game that used to be played behind the barn with cast-off horseshoes is being revived and it looks as if the man whose bank account will not permit him to join a golf club might now get his exercise and his fun out of his own back-yard, in a reasonable amount of time, and at a nominal expense.

All that is needed is four horseshoes, a piece of ground forty feet between the pegs, a neighbor who will throw with you, and a spare hour in the afternoon or evening. If you want really to enjoy the old game get a pair of standard shoes, costing $5 for four. They weigh just two and one-half pounds apiece and are made of iron that will not bend or break. The pegs should stand eight inches above the ground and incline one inch each towards the other. The game may be 21 or 50 points, according to agreement. Nothing counts unless it is eight inches from the peg. The nearest counts one point. Leapers do not count any more than shoes that lie "within the eight-inch distance. Ringers count three. A ringer thrown by your opponent neutralizes a ringer of your own.

And the game is on! That is, it is if your neighbor is the kind that wants to play. No great expense. No long trips to the golf grounds. No dues. Just horseshoes. And the exercise just what you need. Come on! Let's have a game!

The New Order

TO THOUGHTFUL minds it must be increasingly evident that our appreciations of life and its meaning and purpose, are undergoing material changes. Recalling the old existence of only a few short years ago, we feel at once the pettiness, incompleteness and unworthiness of it. The eyes of our understanding have been opened and our vision enlarged.

How narrow now seem the old conceptions of many things! We thought and spoke of that which was deemed so far off, but which seems now near at hand, of vague possibilities that have since suddenly become actualities. Our own little circle absorbed us now we feel that we belong not to ourselves, but to humanity. World-brotherhood we looked upon as a distant dream, hopelessly unrealizable; now we feel the throb of it in the air about us, and know that it is no longer a chimera but a very real thing, although yet formless and unorganized.

We have witnessed the miracle of old nations being reborn in a day and of age-long traditions being flung like wornout garments, into the rag-bag of Time, and we ourselves, feel that we are becoming a part of the new order of things. Our estimates of other people are different now—mostly higher, and assuredly more generous than before. We would be ashamed now to look some of our old corruptions in the face and acknowledge them as ever having been ours.

We seek, by a kind of subtle analysis, to interpret the meaning of these changes, and we find them less exterior than interior—they are largely within ourselves. Looking about us, we note the same tenseness of thought and purpose, the same consciousness that a new road has opened for men to travel, a highway that leads to large liberty and nobler life. Yet not without struggle, since all progress is purchase through hardship and strain. In the multiplied consciousness, we become aware that it is not expansion of a group of individuals, or of a single nation, that is involved, but of all nations. Everything will be changed when the world is one more at peace. Nor can the hearts of men remain unchanged. That this, as well as other developments, will be among the results of the great struggle, is borne upon thoughtful minds with the force of deep conviction.

After the mighty wind that rent the mountains and brake the rocks, after the earthquake, and after the fire, was heard the "still, small voice." The Christian world is listening today to the Voice that calling the nations back to God.

MARSHAL FOCH has brought no win with him from France, and says I will drink none while in the United States. He seems to have more respect for American law than a shocking number of Americans.

CHAPTER XX

A Story of a City Church

By MARION HARLAND

Illustrated by William C. McNulty

I HAVE nothing to say of the early-Victorian minister's wife. The goody-goody books of that period canonize her as 'the Nursing Mother of the Church,' and she may have served the title. My contention is that the active wife of the twentieth century is an ecclesiastical solecism. Not that I advocate the celibacy of the clergy. If ever man needed helpmeet and housemate it is the preacher. He should be cherished and settled and built up—not in 'the most holy faith' one, but in body and spirit. His wife should have more to do with his professional duties than a lawyer's wife has to do with his suits and trials, or a doctor's wife with his cases. If I had learned this cardinal truth thirty years ago I should now be a healthier if not a happier woman."

Thus discoursed Mrs. Barrows, five years older than when we last had the pleasure of seeing her—years that had been kindly discreet in registering the passage of time over her head. Buxom and brisk she was still, albeit there were silver stipplings in her brown hair.

She had taken advantage of a November storm to "treat herself" to a whole day with her friend and confidential crony, Mrs. Stuart Haile. There was no danger of interruptions from callers; Esther had taken her luncheon to school with her, and Stuart Jr. would pick up his at the "Prep" where he was fitting himself for college. Doctors Barrows and Haile would attend the monthly meeting of the clerical club to which both belonged. While Mrs. Barrows talked, she busied herself with crochet-needle and thread in fashioning a table-scarf.

Mrs. Haile sat in a rocking-chair, her head laid against the cushioned back, her feet resting upon a stool. The trim ankles were crossed, the hands rested idly, one upon the other, in her lap. The whole attitude in one of her temperament and habit expressed utter weariness of body and depression of spirit. Mrs. Barrows spread the table-scarf over her knees and pulled the pattern straight. The patient needed diversion rather than counsel. She cast about in her mind for a lively bit of gossip.

"I called upon Mrs. Stenson last week," resumed crochet-hook and thread with the conversation. "I have seen her but once before since the Doctor's death. Her sons have rented her a nice apartment in Ninety-fourth street not far from the Drive. One of them lives with her. You have heard, I suppose, that twenty-five members of the Banner Church resented her with a portrait of Dr. Stenson, painted by Wiley. It hangs in the drawing-room directly opposite the door. The painting is fine, of course, but the frame, my dear, is the principal feature of the picture. It is of light wood, highly polished, and between the outer and the inner edges of the upright sides of the frame is a strip of burnished copper about four inches wide, upon which are engraved the names of the donors. I refrained from looking at the poor dear as I stood with Mrs. Stenson before the atrocity. She met the situation bravely. 'I would have referred that it should be in my sitting-room,' he said, avoiding my eye as she spoke. 'But Dr. Ford, who superintended hanging it, said that the givers particularly requested it should be just there.'"

"Under the picture hangs a smaller frame containing a typewritten poem by Albertha Briggs. It is surrounded by an illuminated border in black-and-gold. My evil genius ordered that I should meet Miss Briggs in the hall on my way out. She stopped me and asked if I had noticed her 'little testimonial to the great and good man who has left us.'"

"The illuminated border is not my composition," she said. "It was executed by a promising young artist, a protégé of mine. The committee saw to it that he was well paid for it."

"The whole affair was unspeakably grotesque and consistent throughout. I must add that Miss Briggs took time to inform me that 'Mr. Wiley never touches brush to canvas for less than a thousand dollars.'"

MRS. HAILE arose suddenly, pulled the footstool to the side of her friend, sank upon it, resting her elbows upon the broad cushioned arm of the easy-chair, her chin between her palms. The eyes, wide and wistful, looked imploringly into the benign face bent toward her.

"It is all, as you say, unspeakably horrible and consistent with the whole tone and policy of that church. Those whose names are inscribed upon that tablet insult the dead and the living. Mr. Ford told me of it yesterday. But let that pass!"

Mrs. Barrows took both of the trembling hands into one of hers and with the other stroked the flushed cheek.

"Precious child!" said her heartsome voice.

"You are not yourself today. What has happened? You have told me sometimes that I was like an elder sister to you. Let me be more to you now. Sit down comfortably in my lap. Yes, I mean it!—and be for an hour or so as 'one whom her mother comforteth.'"

Anita yielded to the loving violence that drew her to the offered resting-place. She told her story with the simplicity and directness of the child her friend had asked her to be.

"You and Dr. Barrows have known, as no others ever can, what a disappointment our experience in this church has been from the first. There is no need to go over the earlier chapters of the story. Mr. Ford's errand last evening had to do with the Friday evening class for Bible Study which Stuart has now conducted for five years. It was a marked success from the beginning. The class was recruited constantly—not from our parish alone, but from young men and lads who were not in the habit of attending church anywhere."

"The class met for the first winter in Stuart's study in the Church House. By the third winter it was necessary to provide more commodious quarters, and since then, they have met every week in the chapel. But far more gratifying than the growth of his audiences was the fact that every Communion season there were accessions to the church from this body of young men. There is now an average attendance weekly of two hundred, and forty have become communicants."

"Highly gratifying, all this, you will say. But listen. You know, better than any woman outside of our parish, that my office as one of the vice-presidents of the Woman's League for Christian Unity—save the mark!—has been from the first the veriest sinecure. I have conscientiously attended the regular meetings, have listened courteously to the proceedings, never by any chance opposed the rulings of the established leaders of the Association; and always voted with the majority. It is needless to say that it often cost me an effort to do all this. It irked me, not a little, to become a cipher on the wrong side of the principal numeral. In one of our earliest conferences with you and your husband you helped me to the title of 'Leading Lady' for the President of the League. She was re-elected to the office for the tenth time at the first meeting of this season. She will continue to hold it as long as she lives."

"In her sovereignty she is supported by the powerful backing of what irreverent youths style the 'middle aislers.' You know the class, and I won't waste words in describing them. Mr. Rupert King, with whose somewhat remarkable history you are familiar, may be called a recalcitrant member of the guild. That is because he obeys the dictates of his own conscience and not the behest of the ruling powers. You have met the Kings several times here, I think?"

"Certainly I have, and with great pleasure," Mrs. Barrows rejoined. "He is the man who, your Mr. MacArthur says, was nearly kicked into kingdom come. What a scurrilous tongue Mr. MacArthur has!"

ANITA made a gesture of strong disgust. "Scurrilous is just the word. You might add 'blasphemous' without exaggeration. Mr. King's conduct has been most exemplary ever since he united with the church. His attachment to Stuart is pathetic, and I have no dearer friend in the world than his wife."

"She is indeed a lovely woman in every way," Mrs. Barrows said. "I hope her baby is thriving. Mr. King could not have given a stronger proof of his devotion to Dr. Haile than by naming his son for him."

"The baby is doing well, thank you. He is now a year old and is as promising a boy as I ever saw. But"—with a half-apologetic smile—"if you switch me off upon that track we shall never get to the pith of my communication—and a very bitter pith it is. As I began to say, it so happened that Mr. King, wishing to see Mr. Miller, called at the Church House one Friday night, winter before last. Mr. Miller's study was dark, but the door leading into the larger room was ajar and the lecture was in mid-progress. Mr. King sat down and heard it to the end. When the class was dismissed he waited to see Stuart and expressed a desire to be enrolled among the students. 'These lads are getting just the education which I never had, and which I miss to this day,' he said. 'Give a fellow a chance, won't you?' To this, of course, Stuart could not consent, and he had some difficulty in making Mr. King understand that it would at once impart a flavor of patronage to this branch of work if it were noised abroad that a millionaire had taken a fancy to it. But it was agreed that Mr. King should come early every Friday night and sit in the dark inner study with the door ajar. This he did regularly and last year, after the transference of the Class to the chapel, he would ensconce himself in a dark corner of the gallery, arriving and departing unseen. His interest in the enterprise grew and strengthened in time. He sent anonymously through Mr. Miller's hands money for a Christmas treat for the boys, including fruits, confectionery and Christmas cards."

"On the Fourth of July he lent his yacht to pastor and assistant requesting them to fill it with 'the boys' for an excursion down the Bay, upon the express condition that Mr. Miller, Stuart, our children and myself should go along and be considered the hosts of the festival. Mr. King's name was never to be mentioned. Nearly a hundred availed themselves of the privilege and enjoyed it hugely. But what gave us the most devout gratification was that ten of the students came for their first communion in June and twelve in October."

"One would naturally suppose that this would have been hailed by the church as a sign that the work of the Lord was prospering mightily. You may imagine, then, what a disagreeable shock we had when two of the elders observed to Stuart that 'while these accessions added to the numerical strength of the church, they did not increase its material prosperity nor augment its reputation in the public eye.' Stuart did not conceal his sorrowful amazement at the remark."

MEANWHILE Mr. King's interest in the Friday night meetings increased steadily. At the first of the autumn meetings there was displayed a new set of stereopticon views which he had ordered from the Far East during the summer vacation. But now comes the climax

Unions Cancel Order for Nation-Wide Railroad Strike

THE success of the United States Railroad Labor Board in averting the threatened nation-wide railroad strike may well inaugurate a new epoch in the settlement of industrial conflicts, for the cancellation of the strike orders issued by the "Big Five" brotherhoods was due to recognition of the rights of the public, as expressed through the government.

The viewpoint of the union leaders was expressed by L. E. Sheppard, president of the Order of Railroad Conductors, who said the strike was called off because of "the growing public opinion that the strike would be against the Labor Board, and consequently the Government, and not against the railroads. It was evident also that the entire Washington administration was opposed to us and that we have had little chance of gaining our objectives. . . . Under such circumstances there was nothing to do but to annul our orders for the October 30 walk-out."

For a time it appeared the Chicago conferences in which the Labor Board, the union leaders and the railway executives participated would be unsuccessful. The railroad executives refused to abandon their announced intention of seeking further wage cuts, but they did give assurances that no carrier would seek changes in wages or working schedules except through the legal agency of the Labor Board. This assurance, together with a Labor Board memorandum announcing that its policy would be not to take up for consideration any request for further wage cuts until it had finished with the matter of rules and working conditions for that class, formed the basis of settlement accepted by the union leaders. Under this policy it probably will be several months before the Labor Board is ready to take up the question of wages again; in fact, it was suggested nothing could be done before next July. Another factor which had weight was the extensive preparations the Department of Justice had made to ask courts all over the country for injunctions against the strike.

There was great relief throughout the nation that the strike had been averted and the removal of the threat of a paralysis of transportation facilities serves to stimulate the resumption of normal industrial activities.

Wirth Again Heads German Cabinet

THE Parliamentary crisis in Germany due to the Upper Silesian decision has been adjusted with the formation of a new cabinet in which Dr. Joseph Wirth retains the post of Chancellor. The majority of the ministers in this "Cabinet of a Predicament," as it has been dubbed, are the same as in the "Cabinet of Fulfillment," which Dr. Wirth formed in May to carry out the terms of the Allied ultimatum, the most important changes being the retirement of Dr. Friedrich Rosen as Foreign Minister and the dropping, for a few days at least, of Walter Rathenau as Minister of Reconstruction. In its first appearance before the Reichstag, the new ministry won a vote of confidence by 230 to 132, with the support of the Majority Socialists, Independent Socialists, Centrists and Democrats.

The Republican flag over the Reichstag building was flown at half-mast as a sign of mourning against the Silesian award, and Chancellor Wirth, in again taking office, declared "the most urgent, but withal the most painful, task" of the government would be the execution of that award, which he termed a great injustice to Germany and contrary to the text of the Versailles Treaty. He announced that this view would be communicated to the Allies and that his ministry would assert that "the rights of Germany upon the territory which has been torn from us have suffered no prejudice through the state of affairs which will be created by force—" a statement which foreshadows new troubles over Silesia when Germany has regained her strength. The note sent to the Allies, however, contained a formal acceptance of the decision, which also has been accepted by Poland.

Beer Regulations Issued

REGULATIONS which permit the prescribing of not more than two quarts of wine or two and one-half gallons of intoxicating malt liquors at any one time for medicinal use by the same person have been issued by the Internal Revenue Bureau. This maximum surely was quite as generous as the most ardent of wets could desire, since no limit was fixed as to the number of prescriptions an individual may obtain. If physicians are willing to write prescriptions and the licensed pharmacists, who alone are permitted to make sales, are willing to fill them the thirsty person may get all the wine or beer he can hold.

The issuance of the regulations had been held up for several months in the expectation that Congress would pass a bill banning the use of wine and beer as medicine. The House and Senate were unable to agree on the final terms of this measure as the result of clashes over amendments to prevent the search of property and dwelling without a warrant and the bill has been shelved while other legislation is being disposed of. Friends of prohibition hoped the "liberality" of the new regulations would startle Congress into a realization of the necessity for prompt passage of the measure, to avoid flooding the country with beer and wine.

There also was comfort for the prohibitionists in the fact that most of the states have laws which will block or drastically limit the prescribing of beer or wine. In only nine states will the new federal regulations be fully effective.

Harding on the Race Question

PRESIDENT HARDING, in an address at Birmingham, Ala., in connection with that thriving city's celebration of its semi-centennial, made some studious observations on the race question in the United States and offered a "suggestion of the true way out" well worth careful thought by the people of both races.

"Politically and economically," Mr. Harding said, "there need be no occasion for great and permanent differentiation for limitations of the individual's opportunity, provided that on both sides there shall be recognition of the absolute divergence in things social and racial. When I suggest the possibility of economic equality between the races, I mean it in precisely the same way and to the same extent that I would mean it if I spoke of equality of economic opportunity as between members of the same race. In each case I would mean equality proportioned to the honest capacities and deserts of the individual.

"Men of both races may well stand uncompromisingly against every suggestion of social equality. Indeed, it would be helpful to have that word 'equality' eliminated from the consideration; to have it accepted on both sides that this is not a question of social equality, but a question of recognizing a fundamental, eternal and inescapable difference. We shall have made real progress when we develop an attitude in the public and community thought of both races which recognizes this difference.

"Take the political aspect. I would say let the black man vote when he is fit to vote; prohibit the white man voting when he is unfit to vote. Especially would I appeal to the self-respect of the colored race. I would inculcate in the wish to improve itself as a distinct race, with a heredity, a set of traditions, an array of aspirations all its own. Out of such racial ambitions and pride will come natural segregations, without narrowing and rights, such as are proceeding in both rural and urban communities now in Southern States, satisfying natural inclinations and adding notably to happiness and contentment.

"On the other hand I would insist upon equal educational opportunity for both. . . . Racial amalgamation there cannot be. Partnership of the races in developing the highest aims of a humanity there must be if humanity, not only here but everywhere, is to achieve the ends which we have set for it.

"Just as I do not wish the South to be politically entirely one party; just as I believe that is bad for the South and for the rest of the country as well, so I do not want the colored people to be entirely of one party. I wish that both the tradition of a solidly Democratic South and the tradition of a solidly Republican black race might be broken up. Neither political sectionalism nor any system of rigid groupings of the people will in the long run prosper our country."

Charles Fails to Regain Throne

THE second attempt of the former Emperor Charles to regain the Hungarian crown has ended in failure quite as inglorious as that which terminated his previous adventure. Constantine has succeeded thus far in remaining on the throne of Greece despite Allied opposition, but the efforts of his Hapsburg imitator to play the kingly rôle in a style dear to the writers of romantic fiction has resulted only in making more certain his permanent exclusion from power.

Alighting from the airplane in which he had fled from Switzerland in violation of his pledges, Charles and the former Empress Zita were greeted by a group of loyalists who had assembled in western Hungary for the coup. In the absence of certain important figures in the plot, the former Empress, who was credited with being the impelling power behind Charles, foresaw the failure which was to come, but even then success was not impossible had Charles advanced promptly on Budapest instead of wasting time in festivities. Meanwhile, the government collected its forces and Admiral Horthy, the Regent, declined to surrender his power as he had been expected to do, whether out of personal ambition or a sincere desire to avoid for his country the warfare which Charles's accession would entail.

Charles weakened, permitted a retreat and then was forced to surrender ignominiously. Plans were made to punish his advisers severely, but for the royal adventure no worse penalty than a return to exile was discussed.

Where to send him remained a problem. Switzerland will have no more of him and his followers and the Allies are unwilling to domicile him in any country from which he may have ready access to Hungary. An island refuge outside Europe was suggested, but there was a disinclination to dignify him with a St. Helena. He was held a prisoner in Hungary pending a decision and the Hungarian government demanded his abdication and recognition of the complete cessation of his dynastic rights. Charles refused to surrender his claim to the throne, and the government was placed in a dilemma, for the ancient Hungarian constitution provides no way for deposing a king.

The nations of the Little Entente were maintaining a threatening attitude, and

The Last Breakfast

A Communion Sermon by REV. FRANK E. HENRY, D.D.*

TEXT—John 21:23. "Jesus then cometh and taketh bread and giveth them, and fish likewise."

THE Disciples had gone to Galilee as Jesus directed. They returned to toil as of old before the Carpenter called them—back to their fish and their farms. Here they had been waiting to see Him again, anxious but expectant. They were undecided as to their future. All was a blank before them. Their only hope lay in Jesus' words to the women at Easter dawn, "Behold I go before you into Galilee."

For this they had turned their faces homeward. But they found Him not. In the desert places east of the Lake they looked for Him—there where their Lord's bounty had multiplied the bread and the fish five thousand fold; but they did not see Him. On the Sabbath in the synagogue they listened for the Voice that had thrilled the thronging multitudes in other days; but the droning intonation of the scribe fell dull and lifeless on their ears instead. On the shore of the sea made sacred by His call to discipleship, they waited at sunset among the fishermen, gathering for the night's work. Here Jesus had resorted at evening, knowing that many would be found ready to listen. With yearning eyes they searched the crowd, looking for that familiar Face; but they did not find Him. They spoke softly, one to another, half-listening, hoping to hear the familiar words, "Verily, I say unto you." But he He did not speak. They waited in the deepening twilight till the last boat-load had left the beach, till the last farewell had been waved by wife or mother, wishing good luck to her fisherman.

Disappointed, almost resentful, Peter bursts out at last, "I can stand it no longer. We might as well go to work, too. I go a-fishing." The others answer in chorus—for were they not fishers before they became His followers?—"We also come with thee."

THROUGH Peter's soul surged the resolution to take again the task of his youth and manhood. The quickened memory of a thousand glad days and nights on Galilee beat upon his brain, keeping time with the lapping of the waves on the side of the boat. The fascinating sea, the lure of the wild and the water held him in thrall. These last years he had traversed repeatedly the land from Galilee to Judea; he had walked wearily through Samaria and the regions beyond Jordan. His feet were sore and his body tired. Here, how soft the watery path! How unwearied the wind that was ever ready to take them up and down. Welcome the sail and the sea!

But the other memories mingled with these—of that day when first the Master had taught the fisher lads from his boat, shoved out from shore—of that night when he sought to go to the Lord on the water and was sinking till the touch of power thrilled him and lifted him from the waves that were clutching at his feet. But that Hand had lost its grip, for the nail had pierced it; that Voice that had lured him from home and led him for three years abroad—had he not heard it broken and pleading from the cross, as he skulked in the safety of darkness round Golgotha? To be sure, the Risen Lord had come to them in the upper room at midnight, but when day came He did not appear. May it not have been but a vision? The women might have deceived themselves and the rest. John had been too credulous at the tomb. Now that they were back home again and his hand on the oar and the net, how different it all seemed. The meaning smiles that his old neighbors had given him the past day or two now recurred to him. To think that a hard-headed business man should have been such an easy mark for a visionary! Well he was back on the job at last and he would not leave it again for another such will-o'-the-wisp!

No fish were to be found in this first stopping-place, so up with the anchor and out with the sail, for the wind was rising. Another favorite place would surely yield them reward for their labor.

Nathaniel was growing weary in the unaccustomed hours. For he had been wont to work in his vineyard and among his trees, by day. Night was the time for sleep! When the net was let down again—his awkward assistance, hindering, rather than helping—he fell into a doze. Dreams of his gardens and fields floated before him. The fig tree was in flower again, and he sat beneath it in the heat of the day. Then came Philip, his friend, and slowly in the dream the face changed and a Stranger spoke to him.

"Follow Me! Greater things than these shalt thou see." Through the years he had followed faithfully. And, oh, the gardens he had seen! the orchards he had looked upon! His little plot was a boy's playground compared to the forest of fig-trees at Jericho.

A ROUGH hand on his shoulder roused him. "We are moving again. Help us hoist the sail." Soon they settled for another try. Nathaniel could no longer sleep. He thought of his neglected fields and his trees under the hands of hirelings. He loved them each as a shepherd loves his sheep. Why had he left them? Three years wasted! They were gone forever. But he would return tomorrow to his home and take again his land. Soon he would recoup his losses of the seasons. He would have so good a crop that the barns already built would not hold his harvests—for had he not observed the skillful ways of the south? Yes, he would tear down his barns and build greater—what was that? Did some one speak? "Thou fool!" Ah, he remembers. He looks guiltily around, but the men are all intent on their work.

Again the boat is moved. This time the oars are manned, for the night wind has fallen. "Once more," commands Peter. "If this is a failure, we will return."

"It is well," answered John and settled to his task

Other boats on Galilee may have caught much that night, but those fishermen were not Apostles. Other organizations than the church today—social, fraternal, patriotic—succeed with these attractions, and these alone. But we are His disciples. The churches need all these attractions, even as the Apostles had their boat and net, but they required one thing more. So we need the presence and power of the Lord. "Without Me, ye can do nothing," He said. With prayer and p-a-r-t-meetings neglected, with Christ-like love and sacrifice forgotten, we can not hope to save the world. We can maintain a company of fearful, faithful disciples; but to win the world we must fellowship with our Lord, must heed His commands.

All night they had toiled. But each time they lifted the net it was found empty. It seemed useless longer to fish. Homeward, Peter turns the ship. Listen! What was that? A Voice, strangely familiar, comes from the shore in the misty dawn.

"Children, have ye ought to eat?"

So, today, one might hail a fishing party, "Boys, have you caught anything?" And they answer Him, "No." I can hear the mingled irritation and disappointment in Peter's exclamation, mounting almost to anger. But hear!

"Cast the net on the right side of the boat and ye shall find." There was such a tone of assurance in the words that the tired men were led to obey.

They cast therefore, and now they were not able to draw it for the multitude of fishes. Something warmed John's heart. Was it the memory of another draught of fish, when the Master had given a like command? As they stooped to lift the net, weighed down with the great catch, John whispered to Peter as they worked together, "It is the Lord!"

JOHN was keener in perception, but Peter was quicker in action. Stopping only to gird his fisher's coat about him, Peter leaped into the sea. Gone his care for fish! Lost, his interest in boat and net! Let others, if they wished, land the catch!

What words of confession, what assurance of forgiveness, were exchanged between the disciple and his Master, we do not know. Too sacred are such scenes for the world's common gaze. But we know that complete reinstatement was Peter's.

The other disciples came in the little boat, as we read, "dragging the net full of fishes." Then Jesus saith unto them, "Come and break your fast." In the breaking of the bread, as to the men at Emmaus, He became known to the rest.

This meal together by the lakeside reminded them, as it may well remind us, of the other meal in the upper room. How strangely the same, yet how strikingly different. At the Last Supper the bread was mingled with the wine of sacrament. At this, their last breakfast, the fish of their daily toil was substituted. The Supper was a ceremonial, the breakfast a necessity. The one was served in a guest-room, about a table, the other on the beach. Night was dark then, with the shadow of the crucifixion; now the day was brightening in the light of the Resurrection. At the Supper they were heavy-hearted, overwhelmed with foreboding. Breakfasting, they were happy in their hope for the future. That evening led them to the mount of death—Calvary. This morning would lead them to the mount of glory—the Ascension.

Another contrast and another similarity. As Peter stood by the fire drying his wet garments, doubtless there comes the memory of that other morning, when he warmed himself by the fire and a cock crew. That was in far Jerusalem; this is Galilee. With shame came the words of his cowardly denial. But the same Jesus turns His eyes on a new Peter.

Come the words, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou Me more than these?" At that other meal in the upper room he had boastfully asserted, "Though all else fail, not I." Here by the lake, there is no such false assurance. "Thou knowest. I dare not say." Came the reply, "Feed My lambs." Not as a fisherman but as a shepherd he was now to be commissioned. By easy steps Jesus leads Peter upward. First simple tasks, beginner's work—"Feed My lambs." Next the more difficult, "Tend My sheep." Last and hardest, "Feed my young sheep." So He commissioned His disciples anew as they broke the bread together, and Peter accepted his task and carried it on to the end.

We, too, come again to break the bread in Jesus' name. Our Lord speaks to us as to Peter, "Do you really love Me?" We answer falteringly, conscious of repeated failure, "Thou knowest." To us in our humility, He speaks again "Feed My sheep."

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited.

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"More Love to Thee, O Christ!" or "Jesus, I My Cross Have Taken."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—The Bread of Life, John, chap. 6: verses 32 to 40.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation—(see page 828, first column).

Sermon—"THE LAST BREAKFAST"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—these may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York, for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"Take the Name of Jesus with You," or "Sun of My Soul, Thou Saviour Dear."

Benediction—by Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

Thou with whose Blessing this service began, and end it now, we beseech Thee, with Thy mercy, and send us away filled with praise for the things that last forever, with joy at the thought of the coming week's work, with peace of heart because our sins are forgiven, and with undying faith in Thy healing power for all the broken-hearted. In Jesus' Name. AMEN.

of holding the net. It seemed dull work tonight. How different from the old days. Then the romance of the starlit waters stirred his boyish soul to dreams. Now the smell of the fishy boat smote his nostrils, grown accustomed of late to the fragrance of flowers on far-off hillsides and the piney smell of mountain-tops. He shut his eyes to hide the ship, and he could see their crimson beauty and the green branches. He seemed to hear gentle words in the soft flapping of the idle sail, "... lilies of the field ..." in all his beauty like one of these ... Ah, that Voice! If only he might hear that Voice again. The last terror of that midnight blackness at noonday, when the soldiers had crucified his Lord, was not the darkness nor yet the quaking earth, but the breaking Voice. "Forsaken! forsaken!" "Nay, Lord," he had hastened to cry, "Nay, dear Master; here are we, Thy mother and Thy beloved." How could he be happy if never again that Voice should sound in his ears.

THAT night they took nothing," so we read. How swiftly, almost abruptly, the story leaps forward. They took nothing. What if they had? What disastrous success it would have been. What a happy failure was theirs instead. When we labor long and conscientiously but unsuccessfully, let us not despair. The end is not yet for us—nor for them.

What a failure is ours when we go a-fishing nowadays without Christ. Even as the Disciples put their trust in strong rowers and swelling sail, in boat and net, yet failed of their fish till Jesus came; so disciples of the present, trusting to attractive churches and good-fellowship, eloquent speech and fine music, but leaving out the spirit of Christ, we fail to catch fish, to make converts.

Valiant Souls

SUNDAY. Jer. 9:3. "Valiant for the truth." Let me turn to that page in the Pilgrim's Progress where Mr. Valiant-for-truth is introduced to us. "Then they went on, and just at the place where Little-faith was robbed, there stood a man with his sword drawn, and his face all over with blood." Then said Mr. Greatheart, Who art thou? The man made answer, saying, I am one whose name is Valiant-for-truth. I am a pilgrim, and am going to the Celestial City. Now, as I was on my way, there were three men did beset me, to wit, Wild-head, Inconsiderate, and Pragmatic, drew upon me, and I also drew upon them. So we fell to it, one against three, for the space of about three hours. They have left upon me, as you see, some of the marks of their valor, and have also carried away with them some of mine. Great odds, said Mr. Greatheart, three against one. 'Tis true, answered Valiant-for-truth; but little or more are nothing to him that has the truth on his side. Then said Greatheart to Mr. Valiant-for-truth: Thou hast worthily behaved thyself; let me see thy sword. So he shewed it to him. When he had taken it in his hands, and looked thereon a while, he said, Ha, it is a right Jerusalem blade. Yes, it is so, said Valiant-for-truth; let a man have one of these blades, with a hand to wield it and skill to use it, and he might venture upon an angel with it. Thou hast done well, answered Greatheart, thou hast resisted unto blood, striving against sin. Then they took him and washed his wounds, and gave him of what they had to refresh him; and so they went on together."

Well now, what does Mr. Valiant-for-truth get out of it all? Let it be confidently said that noble valor has great inheritances. It is a favorite saying of every valorous soul that "nothing ventured nothing is won," and making bold excursions for the truth they are continually enlarging their estates. It is not difficult to mention some of their gains.

In the first place it is the valiant man who has the visions. There is a fine receptiveness to truth in souls who are her brave defenders. The truth they love continually unfolds itself in more delicate grace and beauty. To befriend the truth in a contest is to behold our ward in richer glory. God never gives visions to cowards, and for the simple reason that they would not be able to receive them.

And for a second thing: the valiant man makes open doors where the timid and despondent folk are lamenting that there are none. The folk who have no courage are usually believers in luck. And so they hang about waiting for the lucky chance. "It is all a matter of luck"; and so they loiter on the road, waiting for the mysterious magician who carries the lucky bags and the magic keys; for "you never know when he will come, and open unseen gates into realms that are rich in fine gold."

Yes, but what timid, loitering souls call luck is the prerogative of valiant souls. Opportunities come to the heroic. They find them or they make them. It is so in every sphere. It is so in business. It is so in science. It is so in exploration. It is so in religious enterprise. Doors open to the march of the brave. Closed doors are like the iron gate in the prison at Jerusalem; when certain steps were heard "it opened of itself." The way to the open door is to be valiant for the truth and press forward.

And for a third thing, valor brings the entire being into healthy harmony. I mean that a brave spirit draws every faculty into its train. It marches in wholeness, that is in holiness. A fine heroic purpose sends an inspiring bugle-call through every dormitory in the soul. Timid little sallies, faint-hearted ventures, are not big enough, not robust enough to rouse the slumbering powers, and the slumberers sleep on. We timidly aim at little things, and only little things come out of it. But set yourself to some heroic venture, and all your faculties are out of bed and in your ranks in a trice. There's nothing like a clean, brave, lofty purpose for bringing life into bracing unanimity.

Best of all, far away the best, Mr. Valiant-for-truth always has his great Companion on the road. Christ dearly loves the companionship of the heroic soul. If one may say it with reverence—how He must have loved Paul, and Stephen, and Peter. He inspired their ventures, and loved them for their venturesomeness.

A Christian Land

MONDAY. Psa. 33:12. "Blessed be the nation whose God is the Lord." We are accustomed to say that Columbus discovered America in 1492; but in recognition of divine wisdom and goodness it must be added that Columbus, who sailed under the patronage of Rome, was not at that time permitted to effect a settlement in this country. Had he done so we should now have a Papal civilization. There was a lapse of more than a hundred years between the discovery of America and the settlement of our coast. In that interval history was making; and God with fan in hand was sifting his threshing floor.

One event of that period must needs be mentioned; the nailing of the ninety-five theses to the chapel door at Wittenberg in 1517, which sent the thunders of the Reformation rolling around the world. This helped to make the men who were needed for the pioneer work of our country, Puritans, Huguenots, hither they came at the divine call! They were proper men to carve out the destinies of a great nation. So far as in them lay, they formulated a Christian nation, founding it upon the principles of law and justice set forth in the Word of God.

Let us rejoice in our continuance as a Christian nation thus far. It is for us to say whether refugees from persecution in other lands shall take issue with that fact or not. "God of our fathers, be the God of their succeeding race!" On our loyalty to the principles thus taken by our forefathers from the divine oracles and laid down as the foundation of our constitutional life depends the welfare of our nation and its prosperity under the smile of God.

The Fulfilment of the Law

TUESDAY. Rom. 13:10. "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor: love therefore is the fulfilment of the law." It greatly enhances the value of these words when we consider that they were written by Paul, who was Saul of Tarsus, one who boasted that he had been a Pharisee of the Pharisees, and who had gone, yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples of the Lord, asking letters that he might persecute them at Damascus. The words were written by one who, from his youth up, had been taught that it was the supreme obligation of every man to obey every jot and tittle of the law.

The word for law undoubtedly refers to the Mosaic law, and for Paul that stood as the summary of all that God required of man. In the things specified in the law, man could find out all those things which he must do. If a man would know what the Lord required of him, let him turn to the law. Peace with God lay in compliance, down to the minutest detail. Thus the Jew tried to serve God. The full obligation which man owed his Creator was observance of the law.

It was indeed a daring step that the great missionary to the Gentiles took when he made bold to say that the fulfilment of the obligations to God was to be found in love, not as a theoretical quality of the heart's attitude toward God, but in the love that works no ill to his neighbor. It was a bold step for him to take; a step few are willing to take with him, so have we elaborated, and added to, and misinterpreted the Gospel of our Lord and Master. Are we willing to say that the essence of Christianity is love toward our neighbors; that when we have in our hearts that love for our fellows which is like unto that love which prompted the Christ, we have fulfilled our obligation, not alone to man, but to God?

But we must ever remember that the love which Paul so exalted is the result of Christ in our lives, the first fruit of the Spirit.

The Miracle of Silence

WEDNESDAY. Matt. 27:12. "But when he was accused of the chief priests he answered nothing." Among the many prophetic descriptions of the approaching Messiah there is no stranger one than this: "He shall not strive nor cry aloud." It would seem the prophet had prevision of the methods by which Christ, when He came, was to inaugurate His Kingdom. In nothing is Christ more godlike than in His restraint. In the crisis of His life, He refused to meet railing with railing. Majestic, kingly, self-contained. He answered bitter and angry accusation with silence. It was not a time for speech, but for suffering, for quiet witness-bearing.

There are times when we need the courage of silence, when silence is the best answer to criticism. The enemies of Nehemiah invited him to converse with them. But he would not even discuss the matter. There are times when silence is the weapon with which to conquer the distemper of complaint. Our souls are often tempted to cry out against delay in providence, against the impenetrable mystery of hope deferred and love forsaken, against what seems to us like the deafness if not the enmity of God. It is at times like this His voice is heard, "Be still and know that I am God."

Mystics make much of what they call the inward silence. It is simply the consciousness of power, the assured conviction of a right relationship to God. James Martineau's saying is profoundly true, "God has so arranged the chronometers of our spirits that there shall be a thousand silences between the speaking hours."

"The Manuscripts of God"

THURSDAY. Matt. 13:52. "Therefore every scribe which is instructed unto the Kingdom of heaven is like unto a man that is an householder, which bringeth forth out of his treasure things new and old." There is a glory in the commonplace. It is a revelation of God, as much as the spectacular. The sunshine of a June day is as potent testimony to His might as the storm of a January day which serves as a minister of His majesty.

This is the supreme function of art, to see the glory in the commonplace. Going through life, thinkers and creators, the fashioners of our ideals and standards, study the manuscripts of God and have ears attuned to His voice. There are jewels in the mire and lilies in the muck. "In the mud and scum of things, there, something always, always, sings." There is nothing commonplace in the world. There are poetic potentialities and romantic possibilities even in the lowliest of persons. There are sleeping faculties and dormant energies in uncouth laborers and stevedores. There are rock-like qualities in vacillating Peters and staunch defenders of the faith in wavering Thomases. Jesus saw disciples, apostles, missionaries of His Gospel in fishermen and taxgatherers, and seeing the best in them and building on these foundations, He gave impetus to the Kingdom of Heaven with their lives. All nature, human and otherwise, has a purpose and fits in the plan of God. The world is a treasure house of great personality and divine potencies. It is a vast library from the violet hidden beneath the hedge to man, groping his way to the throne.

Ministering Spirits

FRIDAY. Heb. 1:14. "Are they not all ministering spirits, sent forth to minister for them that shall be heirs of salvation?" Only a little speck of the universe can the human eye behold. Worlds and beings are on every side of us beyond our ken. How little we know of the Infinite; yet we can criticize, doubt, deny and speculate as though all wisdom was ours.

Faith is the eye that scans the vast distance and beholds something of the wonders of God's worlds and beings. We see angelic forms, ministering angels attending us throughout all the journey to our heavenly life. We associate angels with our own departed loved ones, who together accompany us during the years of time. "Angels of light, coming to guide the pilgrims of the night." They are with us, but often our dull eyes do not perceive them, and our deaf ears do not always hear the melody of their hushed voices.

How beautiful to dwell in a world surrounded by those who love us still and delight to comfort and help us on our way to join their company. Like the hosts of the stars, they smile upon us in our night of trial and sing songs of joy to woo us upward. God has angels in His family; He would not live alone; He loves His children and delights to have them love and help each other. What an ideal is this for the social life of earth. Our God lives to create and bless His creatures. He lives in the beings of angels, saints and men more than in spaces, worlds and kingdoms.

The Blessing of Work

SATURDAY. Mark 16:7. "But go your way; tell his disciples and Peter, that he goeth before you into Galilee; there shall you see him, as he said unto you." Peter's legacy seems to have been chosen for himself, in the form of work. After his denial, and the frightful remembrance of it that came with the crowing of the cock, "he went out and wept bitterly." Later, he finds consolation in work. His old occupation as fisherman is to lure him again, and the scene by the lake, was to furnish one of the fondest revelations of the Christ, who died on the Cross, but who still lives. Besides, there came to the disciple who denied his Lord and who wept bitterly over his denial, a reassuring word: "Go tell my disciples, and Peter." And in the triple injunction soon to follow, Jesus was to impress on Peter his true work, "Feed my lambs, feed my sheep!"

It seems a strange thing to be talking to rough, blundering Peter, about tending little, helpless lambs. Was it because Peter always wanted to do the big thing, to head the most spectacular undertakings, that the Lord was so anxious to impress upon him the quiet routine of Christian service? Peter is given to understand the lesson, which also comes to the Church of today, that the risen life of Jesus Christ can bring newness of life to a weary world only through continuous, patient service in duties and tasks that often seem humble and small. Thus it was that the old churchmen understood this lesson when they chanted—"Laborare est orare." ("To labor is to worship.")

At the Sign of the Golden Calf

of his beneficence and, so far as we know, the beginning of the great tribulation.

"To the left of the pulpit and at the head of the right-hand aisle are five pews which once were known as the poor widows' seats. Latterly they were let out in separate sittings and being generally considered undesirable, were sparsely occupied. Mr. King, having noticed that most of the pastor's class were scattered promiscuously through the side-aisles and in the galleries, conceived the idea of providing the new communicants with permanent sittings in that block of pews. He entered into private negotiations with the church-master and conducted these so cleverly that those who had sittings there were induced to exchange them for other and better places somewhere else.

"The new communicants were then informed that a friend who did not wish his name to be known had rented four of these pews and asked as a personal favor to one who was warmly interested in them that they should fill them regularly as if they belonged to themselves. You may be sure the young fellows closed in delightedly with the offer and, Sunday after Sunday saw them in the places assigned to them. While most of the young men were composed of clerks, book-keepers, etc., they were without exception respectable in appearance and correct in deportment.

"As this arrangement was effected without publicity or bustle, it was a surprise to the entire congregation when, on the last Sunday of September, the hitherto sparsely-settled pews were filled with ranks of black-coated youths whose faces were strange to most of the beholders. Nor was this the worst of the exhibition. Many of the lads had fine voices and all loved to sing. The volume of sound that broke against and swelled above the galleries on that first Sunday as the congregation arose for the first hymn was astounding to the unprepared audience. The 'sound of many waters' was as nothing by comparison.

"A musical Niagara," Mrs. King called it afterward. Before I left my pew I was seized by Mrs. Stone who sits directly behind me. 'Where in the world did that crew come from?' she said. 'And what does it all mean?'

"I may say that Mr. Miller was equal to the occasion. As soon as the benediction was pronounced, he hurried down to the ranks that were waiting to speak to him.

"It was good to see so many of you here this morning, boys," he said, 'and to hear you sing in such good time and tune. But put a little less power into your lungs next time. Don't raise the roof, and give the organ and choir a chance!'

"Of course this was greeted with a laugh that was an additional offence. But the admonition had the desired effect in the afternoon and upon subsequent Sundays. I am not quite sure what a phalanx is, but no other word comes to me at sight of those rows of recruits all standing 'at attention' while Doxology and hymns are sung. Miss Maynard was constrained by her ever-present sense of duty to make me a visitation early Monday morning.

"Poor, dear Mrs. Wingate was so shocked," she said, 'that she dropped into her seat at the third line of the Doxology, and was barely able to remain throughout the service, and I heard so many unpleasant remarks before I left the church that I had no heart left in me. One stranger, evidently a lady of refinement, said that she didn't know this was a mission church, and Miss Briggs actually overheard another say that the rows of young men so plainly dressed reminded her of a ragged regiment. And it cannot be denied, dear Mrs. Haile, that they are a discordant feature in a refined congregation!'

"THE unfortunate church-master who had let the pews could only plead in extenuation of the blunder that Mr. King had rented them for particular friends and paid for them in advance. In short, our friend Mr. King had blundered egregiously in his zeal. Complaints and inquiries have poured in upon Stuart like a flood. The last wave was a violent remonstrance from a committee of two, Messrs. Ford and Dennis, who waited upon their highly esteemed pastor last evening.

"The plain English of the matter is that the whole affair is a nuisance and must be abated, or at least mitigated," was Mr. Dennis' way of summing up the case against Mr. King and the unfortunate pastor.

"And from Mr. Ford—who has the kindest heart and the hardest head in the world—I say, can't the 'ragged regiment' be transported to the gallery and some of the gallery-pew-ites take their high seats in the synagogue?"

"Naturally the discovery that a multimillionaire is the chief agent in bringing about the calamity is some mitigation of the nuisance. But, as Mr. Ford represented, 'it is not right that the Banner should suffer loss of prestige on that account.'

"There, my dear, you have the whole story—not in a nutshell, but in a bomb-shell, that may explode at any hour. I have thought over it and prayed over it, and I am ashamed to say, cried over it, all of last night, and the path before us is as blind as ever.

"For, as you and every one who knows him must acknowledge, my husband's knack, or talent—some call it genius—for attracting and managing young men is remarkable. The inception and phenomenal growth of this Class for Bible Study is but one evidence of this. In the seven years of our residence here he has received and accepted many invitations to preach in universities and address college societies. It is hard to see why through this, which should be an engine of great good, such discomfiture has come upon him."

Mrs. Barrows chafed the chilled, quivering fingers with her warm hands.

"Sit still, darling child!" as Anita offered to rise. "I am cuddling you in my heart of hearts as I never did before—and you have always been as dear to me as if you were my own daughter. This nasty business—no other term just fits it—will work out all right in the long run. Stand in your lot and wait on the Lord—wait, I say upon the Lord." One text has haunted me while you were talking. 'Stand still and see the salvation of the Lord.' Command and promise join hands there. Obey one and don't forget the other. You may tell Stuart when he comes in that I left this watchword for him, too. Here comes Norah with the tea-tray!"

CHAPTER XXI

THE soothing effect of what some stigmatize as "Woman's Tiptle" betrayed itself in the eyes and voices by the time the tea equipage was removed.

Anita touched briefly and brightly upon the banned topic:

"You have not forgotten what is known in our family as 'The Frozen Freeman Episode.' It does me good to turn a clean leaf in the ugly story. The two boys whose 'anties' marred the Leading Lady's enjoyment of the welcome-home anthem, all unconscious of their misdemeanor, joined the Friday evening class that very week, and were regular attendants for that and two succeeding seasons. We invited them to dinner about once a month and became really attached to them. If Stuart's influence had anything to do with the resolution of both brothers to become students of divinity after their graduation from the University, it was exerted unconsciously. They are now in Brainerd Hall which is, as you know, the largest Theological Seminary in Pennsylvania. Both young men will be licensed next June and are likely to do well in their chosen profession. Stuart was invited to preach the Commencement sermon at Brainerd Hall last year, and had most satisfactory interviews with his former pupils."

Mrs. Barrows nodded approval, then glanced out of the window.

"But my precious child! it is time

Name.....
Address.....

I was thinking of going home. I left orders that a taxi should be sent for me, should the storm continue, as it does unquestionably. And you have not told me yet what was the burden of Mr. Ford's talk last evening."

Mrs. Haile clasped her hands despairingly:

"It took him an hour to unburden himself. The purport of his communication was that something must be done and that quickly."

"The church is growing, Doctor," said Mr. Ford. "That cannot be denied. But it is losing caste, if I may be allowed the expression. We are not gathering in 'representative men and women.' This is what Mrs. Ainslie, who is one of the cleverest women I know said to me on Sunday. From what I can learn of Mr. King's change of attitude his seems to have been one of the old-fashioned conversions that we seldom hear of nowadays. Indeed, they may be considered an anachronism—that was just the word she used—in the modern church. 'This is not a mission church, Mr. Ford,' said she, 'and it should be run upon different lines from those introduced by Mr. Miller and sanctioned by Dr. Haile.'"

"And others are saying and thinking the same thing. It is the old story over again," Mr. Ford went on to say, "trying to make bricks without straw."

"WHEREUPON Stuart turned upon him like a wounded lion. I can think of no other figure that suits the case. 'This travesty of religion has gone on long enough and I, for one, will stand for it no longer. The Church of God on earth is made up of sinners who have turned from the error of their ways and become redeemed souls saved by the blood of Christ. My soul sickens at the words 'representative men.' There was but one 'representative man' among the Twelve Apostles, and he was the treasurer, Judas Iscariot. St. James tells us that some of the breed attended religious assemblies in his day and received the same treatment from the worshippers of the Golden Calf that 'representative men' of today get. They wore golden chains and tailor-made robes and were seized upon and escorted to places well up the middle aisle. The poor man in ready-made clothes was shunted into a corner near the door."

"The Church as instituted by the Master was built upon the foundations of the apostles and the prophets, Jesus Christ Himself being the chief cornerstone. The soul of the mechanic and seamstress and beggar is as precious in the sight of Our Lord as that of the millionaire and woman of fashion. There are still—and I thank God upon every remembrance of them—churches in this and in every other city throughout the land in which old-fashioned conversions are the rule and not the exception. In them is to be found the saving sort of so-called Christianity. You speak the truth when you say that ours is not a mission church, but it is the shameful truth."

"With that he went out of the room and I heard him slam the study door after him, leaving me to get the poor stunned men out of the house as decently as possible. Neither of us slept an hour last night, and the prospect is as gloomy today."

The motherly friend condensed the wealth of longing sympathy and desire that swelled her great heart into a few parting words:

"Wait on the Lord. Be of good courage and He shall strengthen thy heart. Wait, I say, on the Lord."

As Mrs. Haile opened the front door to let her friend pass out after good-nights had been exchanged, the postman handed her a single letter. She read the superscription under the hall lamp. It was for her husband, and in the upper left-hand corner was the printed address of Brainerd Hall.

She smiled affectionately, "Ah! one of the dear boys!"

Then she laid it upon the library table and—but this she did not know—upon the exact spot where Rupert King had spread out and smoothed down with his angry fist the creases of the odious anonymous letter.

Stuart found the letter there when he came in an hour later. Having shaken the sleet from his overcoat and hung it up in the hall, he entered the library and was making for the fire upon the hearth when he espied the letter.

He took it to his wife who had donned a gown that he liked, and wore her brightest smile in announcing that dinner was waiting for him.

The letter was from the trustees of Brainerd Hall Seminary. It contained a formal request that he would accept the chair of Pastoral Theology in that institution, made vacant by the death of Rev. W. S. Pritchard, D. D.

SIX months later. Extract from a letter written by Lawson Freeman to his sister:

"Our president gave us a delightful surprise on Commencement Day by announcing that the chair of Pastoral Theology in Brainerd Hall Seminary had been endowed with a sum, the interest of which will double the salary of the present incumbent."

"The munificent gift comes through a New York banker who is the agent of a friend of the seminary, whose name is unknown even to the president. The agent added as the only message transmitted through him 'that it is a thank-offering.'"

"Of course conjectures run riot. The president suggests that the donor may be a former student of the seminary. This strikes me as highly improbable. There are few men in the profession who can afford to make a thank-offering of such magnitude. We 'Freeman boys' know of one multi-millionaire who obeys conscientiously the injunction not to let his right hand know what his left hand does, and who has, moreover, abundant reason to be thankful to the 'present incumbent.' This theory is probably as wild as the president's idea of a millionaire minister. If there were any truth in it, Dr. Haile would be likely to suspect it at least, and he assured me today that he has never had the slightest intimation of any such intention on the part of any man living. That would seem to establish the absurdity of our theory."

"Dr. Haile looks ten years younger than when he entered upon the duties of his office last January. As we prophesied, he is winning golden opinions from students and faculty, filling the niche as if he had been measured for it!"

THE END

EVERY church, large or small, should develop a mailing list of every member of the congregation, and then divide the list two ways—active and inactive," says Homer Buckley, well-known layman of Chicago. "Special letter-mailing should be sent to the inactive list from time to time urging their attendance at services, calling attention to special sermons, musical programs, meetings, etc."

"In every community there are people not affiliated with any church in particular. These names should be listed and invitations issued from time to time by letter or by card, inviting their attendance at special or regular services."

"It has been my privilege to serve as a member of the Publicity Committee of the Chicago Sunday Evening Club—a non-sectarian organization, holding a religious and inspirational Sunday Service in Orchestra Hall, in the downtown business section of Chicago."

"The average attendance at these Sunday evening services is 2200."

"The Chicago Sunday Evening Club has been conducting these services for ten years, and was organized primarily to provide a place for the strangers in the city—guests at hotels, etc.—to spend Sunday evening."

"Intensive methods of publicity have been employed and important among these have been direct mail methods. Every hotel guest in Chicago on Sunday morning finds an invitation in his mailbox inviting his attendance at the Sunday evening service, with name of speaker, subject and musical program."

"At different intervals letters are sent to boarding-houses, rooming-houses, within a mile radius, with cards of invitation enclosed, for distribution among the roomers and boarders—those in particular without any church affiliation invited to attend. This has proved very effective."

Protection!

SHE has the calm and tranquil confidence of the woman unafraid. The dependable steel traction fingers, reaching down through the treacherous skidways, making her ride safe and pleasant, are symbolic of the intelligent, loving care that protects her and the life within her keeping.

This protection against skid shock is one of the most important of safeguards during the weeks and months of suspense, of nerve tension, when shock is the greatest of dangers.

The motorist who fails to put on Weed Tire Chains when the going is slippery is not only inviting disaster to women in his own car and in passing vehicles, but he is also jeopardizing the future generation.

Even the woman pedestrian is not immune from skid shock. The car with chainless tires, on slippery streets, may dash upon the sidewalks without a moment's warning.

Skid shock lasts long. Many women victims of skid shock never recover from it. Merely witnessing a skidding accident may cause skid shock with consequences equally serious—and lasting.

For their own well-being, for the health and happiness, perhaps the very lives of those for whom they make such great sacrifices, women should insist upon the use of Weed Tire Chains.

Briand Wins Victory

PREMIER BRIAND, as he comes to America at the head of France's delegation to the Conference on Limitation of Armament, has the satisfaction of knowing that he has back of him a substantial majority in the Chamber of Deputies, a majority won after an uphill fight in which only his political generalship saved him from overthrow. His enemies based their vigorous attack against him on domestic questions, but the Premier adroitly shifted the issue to foreign matters, demanded that he either be retired or be allowed to go to Washington with a mind free from worries over maintaining a Parliamentary majority, and then won the vote of confidence by 381 to 186. It was a decisive victory and is expected to permit the Premier to prolong his attendance at the Conference.

In the Senate the debate over the vote of confidence was perfunctory, marked by expressions of the greatest good-will toward the United States and President Harding's efforts for the limitation of armament, and the Premier won by 301 to 9.

The question of Premier Lloyd George's attendance at the Conference remains in doubt as this is written, the critical stage of the Irish negotiations threatening to compel his staying at home.

It was made known in Washington that the American government has a real plan for the limitation of naval armament for presentation to the Conference. This plan has been worked out carefully on the basis of reports by naval experts and has engaged much of the time of the American delegation. Its nature and scope were kept secret, but officials were hopeful it would form the foundation for an agreement to reduce naval expenditures, although they are ready to give full consideration to the plans which other Powers may offer.

HOUSE CENSURES BLANTON. Representative Thomas L. Blanton of Texas was censured publicly by the Speaker of the House for causing the insertion of objectionable matter in the Congressional Record, a resolution of censure having been adopted by a vote of 293 to 0. A resolution to expel him from the House lacked only eight votes of the required two-thirds.

HOUSE PASSES DEBT REFUNDING BILL. The House has passed by a vote of 199 to 117, a bill giving to a commission of five, one of whom is to be the Secretary of the Treasury, full power to arrange for the refunding of the $10,000,000,000 owed by foreign countries to the United States. Senate leaders promised prompt action on the measure.

UNUSUAL CHURCH MERGER ARRANGED. Nearly the entire membership of the Eastern Classis of the Hungarian Reformed Church in America numbering 15,000, has entered into an agreement to affiliate with the Episcopal Church. The Hungarian Church of which the Classis is a branch dates back to the Reformation.

PRINCE OF WALES STARTS FOR INDIA. The Prince of Wales has left England aboard the battle cruiser Renown for an eight months' tour of India and Japan. There has been much unrest in India recently and his mission in that country which includes visits to many cities has aroused some apprehension. In Japan he will return the visit of the Japanese Crown Prince to Great Britain.

NON-PARTISAN LEAGUE DEFEATED. The state-wide recall election in North Dakota has resulted in a defeat for the Non-Partisan League and the ousting from office of Governor Lynn J. Frazier, Attorney-General William Lemke and John N. Hagan, Commissioner of Agriculture and Labor—the "Big Three" of the Industrial Commission. R. A. Nestos, an independent, was elected governor by a majority of about 10,000 out of 200,000 votes. The League was planning to contest the validity of the election.

TWENTY-THREE PERISH IN CANADIAN FLOOD. Twenty-three persons lost their lives, fifteen were seriously injured, and a dozen are missing as the result of the destruction of the mining town of Britannia Beach, near Vancouver, B. C., by a mountain flood.

SOVIET OFFERS TO ACCEPT OLD DEBTS. The Bolshevist government has made a new bid for the recognition of the Allied Powers by offering to recognize the old Russian debts, incurred up to 1914, under the condition that "Russia be given certain privileges making possible the practical fulfillment of those obligations." The holding immediately of an international conference to consider claims and to work out a final treaty of peace was proposed to the Allies and America.

FRANCE AND MUSTAPHA KEMAL AGREE. The French government has announced its ratification of an agreement with the Turkish Nationalist government at Angora by which France is to withdraw from Cilicia, the boundary between Turkey and Syria is drawn, and France receives economic advantages including a concession for the operation of the Bagdad railroad from the Mediterranean to the Tigris River and a ninety-nine year lease on certain mines. This involves a further divergence in French and British policy, since Britain still upholds the Constantinople government.

IRISH NEGOTIATIONS AT CRISIS. Pending a statement by Premier Lloyd George before the House of Commons and a threshing out of the Unionist opposition in Parliament to the course of the Irish negotiations, meetings between the Irish and British representatives were deferred. It was anticipated the Premier would defeat the opposition easily and that the parleys would be resumed at once, although the negotiations have been near a breakdown. Success in averting a break appeared to hinge largely on Ulster's willingness to co-operate with Southern Ireland.

KING ALEXANDER RETURNS TO BELGRADE. King Alexander of Yugoslavia has left Paris, where he has been living for several months, to return to Belgrade. Since the death of King Peter several weeks ago there had been much uncertainty as to the succession owing to the belief that Alexander preferred private life in Paris to the dangers and worries of being the ruler of a Balkan state.

Dr. Sandison's Personal Letter To You

DEAR FRIENDS:

A few days ago, Mr. Patterson, the President of our organization, invited me to write a personal message to our readers. I gladly agreed to do this.

Several years have passed since I last had this opportunity. I recall with a good deal of pleasure the old days, when I used to write frequently. You can never know how much your kindly responses helped your Editor. With such letters from such a constituency, I felt as one who could face any ordeal—and conquer. I seem to feel again the clasp of those hands that had helped us up the "Hill Difficulty," and with whose assistance we climbed even the most stubborn peaks.

Then came the war and the shock to civilization. The Church seemed paralyzed. Missionary work halted in semi-collapse while the conflict raged. Industrial upheaval followed the war, and general depression. But God has been good to us. Our beloved land is coming out of all the turmoil with courage and hopefulness. We have the greatest reasons for thankfulness.

As for the Christian Herald itself, it has passed through these trials safely. Like a good, staunch ship it has weathered the storms and is as fit and ready for service as ever. And with your aid, it is doing the best kind of service in these eventful months. The Churches of all denominations are making it the vehicle for expressing their approval of the Armament Reduction Conference, and have poured in letters showing that all the congregations are alive to the great opportunity and that God's approval and leadership must be sought for the movement, to assure its success.

We want you with us in these and other undertakings which are so closely related to the world's happiness and the advancement of the Kingdom of Christ. In the past, we can recall many of the glorious Campaigns in which we fought side by side with the steadily growing number of our readers. Today we have enterprises on an even larger scale. In China, we have reconstructive and orphan work after the great famine, also a beautiful orphanage for girls in Jerusalem, and missionary connections all over the globe. Our home field too has wonderfully widened. Churches of every denomination are co-operating with us in the signed Memorial Resolutions to President Harding in favor of Disarmament and World Peace. The movement in the Church is epochal and can not fail to inspire the Conference.

We want you and your friends with us, heart and soul, in all of these enterprises. We want you and the new members you can bring into our Family Circle, to be more than ever a power for righteousness not only in our own land but throughout the world.

You know the Christian Herald and its conductors and contributors. You know Pastor Jowett, Dr. Sheldon, and the long line of other spiritual leaders whose Gospel ministry is given through its pages. And I feel sure that you will respond in the right spirit when I ask you—each of you individually—to WIN ONE new reader at least for the Christian Herald this year. Send in any new subscriptions with your own on the blanks below. This is why I have headed my letter with the invitation

Young People's Topics for November 20

By REV. RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN

The Goodness of God

B. Y. P. U. and C. E. Psalms 34: 1-10
(Thanksgiving)

"I WILL bless the Lord at all times," says the Psalmist in the opening words of our reference. Thanksgiving is not a date on the calendar but an attitude of mind, a state of the heart, a principle of viewpoint. God and goodness are synonymous and God is good all the time because God never changes.

The topic might lead us into the realm of the metaphysical, philosophical and theological and therein we might flounder in our definitions and interpretations concerning the nature and attributes of God. The best and sanest way to understand God is through the perfect revelation He has made concerning Himself in the person and teachings of Jesus Christ. We know that Jesus Christ was a good man in that He had no sin. Just for the present that kind of goodness is not our theme. Our theme is the goodness of Jesus in His relationship to others. This may be understood when we review His sympathy, mercy, love, gifts, brotherliness and co-operation. The attitude of Jesus toward the world of men and women has always been the attitude of God to the world since its creation.

God, however, was misinterpreted and misrepresented all through the ages as many incidents of history, church and secular, have shown. But "God is love." God has always loved the world. God does love the world. God shall always love the world. His demands are not difficult. His precepts are not hard; His commandments are not a yoke. This is also the testimony of history. Those who do God's will are in harmony with God's purpose and those who do not God's will cause a break in the harmony. Sin always breaks the harmony. Obedience always makes melody. Suffering and misery are not the fault of God but the result of our refusing to play the score which God has placed before us. "The stars in their courses fought against Sisera." Naturally. The reason was that Sisera was against the stars. Obedience to the law of fire gives us heat and comfort, disobedience gives us devastation and pain. Abuse of privilege makes for destruction. Intelligent use makes for efficiency and peace. Shakespeare was right when he wrote:

"Men at some time are masters of their fate:
The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars,
But in ourselves, that we are underlings."

A Surrendered and Victorious Life

E. L. Gal. 2: 1-7

THE above exposition covers anything we may say concerning the topic of "A Surrendered and Victorious Life." The present theme, reduced to a word, is "Conformity." The logic of the unrest and unreason of today is lack of conformity to the will of God. It is rebellion against the best ideas and ideals for humanity. It is a lack of patriotism in relation to the values of the kingdom of God as given in revelation.

It would be a profitable few moments for us could we review the pageantry of the world's conformers to the truth of God as revealed in Jesus Christ. Wherever and whenever men have adopted the principles of Jesus, lived true to "the distinctive ideas of Jesus" there you find peace and harmony. The solution for the world's perplexities, politically, commercially, socially, and internationally, is conformity to the teachings of Jesus Christ, individually and collectively. Christianity has not failed but it has been found difficult and therefore not tried. Our message to the world is: "You have tried all kinds of schemes for betterment and you have experimented with all manner of so-called panaceas; now try the rules and regulations of Christianity as given by Jesus Christ."

Paul Before the King

International Sunday School Lesson for November 20
Acts 25:1-26:32

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

POISE is a great quality to possess, so that the right-living person is unafraid in the presence of either God or man. A direct, conscious interview with God was not an unusual experience for Paul, and such a man could assuredly stand boldly in the presence of earthly rulers. Before Felix and Drusilla this prisoner at Caesarea had freely declared the facts in his life, and two years of study into the deep things of the spiritual life had but strengthened him in his convictions and his purpose to be a witness for Jesus Christ on every possible occasion.

Festus has taken the place of Felix as governor. The Jews at Jerusalem lost in their first attempt to use him as a tool that they might take the life of Paul by the execution of another plot to waylay him. The new governor insisted that the further trial must take place at Caesarea, so the accusers, with new charges and distorted evidence, made the journey northward. Paul offered a general denial. Festus doubtless understood matters clearly; yet he was ready to play into the hands of the Jews, if possible, so he suggested to Paul that the case be adjourned to Jerusalem. Then it was that Paul, seeing the hopelessness of the situation, used his right as a Roman citizen by making his appeal to have the next sitting of the case take place at Rome. "I appeal unto Caesar," said Paul and the scheming enemies were completely foiled. The governor then had no choice, but must bow to the distinguished prisoner with a reluctant amen—"so let it be."

The protection of the law under a good government is a great blessing to the individual citizen. Those who have had legal matters to attend to in non-Christian lands have often had troubles rather than either benefits or justice. In America, the basest criminal, however poor, is defended by a lawyer of recognized ability, and sentence is pronounced only after due process of law. We are also citizens of a spiritual kingdom where the rights of every one are both recognized and protected. There is the fullest justice for each; and where judgment must be pronounced no mistake is made. When we sin and are penitent we have the Son of God to plead for us, "And if any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous," 1 John 2:1.

GOVERNORS have their troubles. The man in high position generally needs our sympathy: For example, think of him when sentence of death is about to be carried out and the family and friends of the convicted importune for pardon or postponement. If he declines he is called brutal and unfeeling. Festus had on his hands a prisoner whom he believed to be innocent of the charges against him and who had appealed unto Caesar. Moreover he did not know what to write Caesar when he sent the man to Rome. Fortunately King Agrippa II, with Bernice, his sister, came to Caesarea and Festus could lay Paul's case before him. There is no need to turn to fiction for a dramatic setting; it is found right in our lesson for today. A prisoner having been kept two years and frequently accused during that time, is called upon to speak on a most formal occasion in the presence of a governor, a king who is living incestuously with his sister, and that sister present too—and all "with great pomp."

The occasion was another great opportunity for Paul and he rejoiced in the privilege of once more telling his life story, which of course must include that of his wonderful conversion when nearing Damascus. Paul was always at his ease among men—and why not? He had the most important message to deliver that they could hear anywhere. He believed supremely in the efficacy of the Christ to cleanse from sin.

Think of the natural approach of a salesman who has a big article to dispose of. Would the man who has a steamship, a bridge or a three-mile-long tunnel to sell come haltingly into the presence of the prospective customer? If any man would put up a "front" it is the agent of a great concern. With boldness and assurance we can go about our life-work of introducing others to Jesus.

The subjects of Herod Agrippa and Festus might hear a command and do as they pleased, but not so with Paul and his King. "Wherefore, O King Agrippa, I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision," said the court preacher.

Few living men have made a deeper impression upon life today than has Rev. F. B. Meyer, D.D., of London. The night before he sailed for his homeland this fall, he addressed a Sunday school meeting in Newark, N. J., and so eager were people to hear him that the large church was packed and about 500 failed to gain admission. The spiritual value of his messages are beyond calculation. He said in one of his books, "I urge young people especially to seek from God the vision of what life may be, and then obey it, because when they catch God's vision, they will always find Him responsible for the outworking of His plan." Dr. Meyer has written character-study books on a number of the great men of the Bible, and one of the most helpful is recommended to all who are studying these lessons on Paul; it is entitled, "Paul a Servant of Jesus Christ." Concerning this book the author wrote in the Preface: "Of the many sacred biographies I have written, this has been by far the most interesting."

PAUL, though a prisoner, did not merely address his audience, but he talked personally about individual salvation to the king, who certainly needed it. Position in life does not change the fact that "all have sinned." Festus was a close listener, too, for Paul also made the message personal to the governor, who, in a loud voice, interrupted by calling the speaker "mad." Paul was encouraged by the very interruption and boldly personally addressed Agrippa, saying, "I know that thou believest the prophets." Whether the king intended the reply to be a sneer or not, Paul, with all seriousness and aroused feeling of concern, offered the prayer that Agrippa might be a Christian, whether with little or with much persuasion. When Agrippa stood before Christ the Judge he could not plead as an excuse for the staying of judgment that no one had ever told him the truth about the essentials for salvation, and when Paul came before that same Judge he would be guiltless with reference to Festus, Agrippa, Bernice, Felix, Drusilla and countless others, whether in high or low station in life.

Taking his theme from Acts 26:28, P. P. Bliss wrote that ever-helpful song, "Almost Persuaded." It has sung many into the Kingdom as they faced the truth of the third verse:

"Almost persuaded," harvest is past!
"Almost persuaded," doom comes at last!
"Almost" can not avail;
"Almost" is but to fail!
Sad, sad, that bitter wail—
"Almost"—but lost!

Those who sat in the royal seats that day at Caesarea rendered their decisions concerning the Christ, whom Paul represented. Every reader of these lesson studies is faced with the same necessity. Christ speaks to you as He did of old, "Whom say you that I am?" The verdict must be right or the individual faces the continuous consequences. In turn, each teacher can help the pupils to render their personal verdict, in view of all the evidence: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God!"

Questions and Answers

F G. M., Corvallis, Oreg. The passage in John 2:15, refers to love of the world, its riches, honors and pleasures, its snares and its temptations—the lusts of the flesh, the pride of life, the selfish gratifications, the foolish pomp and splendor with which it allures. A man, however, may love the world in the sense of loving his fellowmen, but that is a different proposition. To have a wide compassion for our fellows and a desire to help them is not the carnal love of which John wrote, but the opposite. "He who is born of God," writes one commentator, "turns to God; he who is of the world turns to the world; the sources of love to God and love to the world are irreconcilably distinct." Throughout His teachings, Jesus emphasized this. He prayed for His disciples, not that they might be taken out of the world, but that they might be kept free from its temptations, and given strength to overcome the world. See also Rev. 3:21. To your other inquiries, we would answer (1) the words attributed to Napoleon have been widely published and are generally accepted as genuine. (2) Write to your Congressman in Washington for information about progress of the Education Bills.

Rev. G. B. Cooke, Mathews, C. H., Va., would be grateful to any reader of this paper who could send him a copy of the verses beginning:

"Stay, jailer, stay and hear my woe;
He is not made that kneels to thee."

E. C. S., Lebanon, O., writes: "In your paper of September 17, under the heading: 'Why not try it?' you tell of a meeting held in Hyde Park, London, at which representatives of many religions were present, including most of the leading Protestant denominations, together with Catholics, Unitarians and Quakers. The Friends, or Quakers, are a Christian or Protestant church, and while their numbers may not be so great as some other churches, yet their faith and belief are strong in all the essentials of the Christian faith. Through Christ alone we have access to a throne of grace, and the forgiveness of sin. I am an old subscriber to your magazine, and read and like it very much."

Miss C. L. Y., Meriden, Conn., writes: "We read the statement some time ago by General Bliss in the Christian Herald, and think he is right in holding that the responsibility for the peace of the world rests on the shoulders of Christians. The lives of my parents are to me certain proof of the truth and power of the Christian religion. If Christ can save and keep in righteousness, health, peace and happiness one person through a long life (my mother is nearly eighty-nine years of age) He has power to save the world. I feel that I owe a very great debt to the world. No doubt thousands of Herald readers of like experience realize the same heavy weight of responsibility. But what can an atom in the universe do to help the world? The Christian atoms must co-operate, and lead, and insist that the spiritual principles of Christ shall rule the world. The time is ripe for America to show her Christianity, the moment of the ages having come, when we must insist on Christ's commandment of brotherhood being extended from individuals to nations. We hope America's leadership in a wise disarmament policy will be followed by all nations, and a long step forward will have been taken in leading the nations to Christ, the only hope of the world for permanent peace."

M. L. M., Deerfield, N. H. The passage in John 14:30, "The prince of this world cometh," etc., refers to the same satanic power which has been designated as the "prince of the power of the air," "the adversary," "the tempter," etc. He always comes with hostile intent, but his effort to tempt Christ, proving wholly unavailing, shows what the Saviour meant when He used the phrase "and he hath nothing in me"—that is that Satan had nothing of his own in Him "nothing of sin on which to fasten as a righteous cause of condemnation." The next sentence is essential to the completeness of the sense of the whole paragraph. Having characterized the attempt of the evil one it is as though Jesus had said, "but though the prince of this world, in plotting my death, had nothing to fasten upon, I am going to yield myself up a willing sacrifice, that the world may know that I love the Father, whose commandment it is that I give my life a ransom for many."

L. G., New York, writes: "I have been greatly interested in the story of the 'Little Maids of Palestine,' in the Christian Herald Orphanage in Jerusalem. Are your subscribers to have an opportunity to send them Christmas gifts this year, as they had on a previous occasion? I feel that there are many who, like myself, would be glad to help make Christmas a happy and memorable time to those helpless little waifs of the great war, who have come through great tribulation, losing parents and home."

As the same suggestion comes to us from several sources, we are glad to comply. A Christmas offering for the little maids—there are thirty-seven of them in the Orphanage—will be accepted from those readers who are interested. We will suggest to Mrs. Vester, the Superintendent, that every contribution have a separate acknowledgment, which she will mail from Jerusalem direct to the donor. All contributions should be addressed to the Christian Herald, Bible House, N. Y.

J. B. W., Fruita, Colo., writes: "Your mention in the Mail-Bag of September 17 regarding the keeping of the Passover by the Samaritans, at the present time, came to my notice today. Some months since, the Geographic Magazine published an article written by a traveler in Palestine, wherein he describes the keeping of the Passover by a few Samaritans. They went up into a neighboring mountain, led by an aged and feeble priest, and in the presence of a number of onlookers, the traveler among them, observed the ceremonial. The author appeared certain that no others in Samaria attempted to observe the Passover that year, and from the feebleness of the priest, the mere handful of participants and the unsettled condition of the surrounding country, he doubted if another attempt would be made to observe the feast the following year, or perhaps ever."

M. R., Covington, Ky. The outlook in the unemployment situation is now more hopeful. The action of the Unemployment Conference in deciding to stimulate activity in the building trades, looks to the expenditure in the near future of $10,000,000,000 in new construction. Labor costs and the price of materials on the one hand, and maximum production on the other must both be considered. This plan it is estimated would give work to about 2,000,000 men for the better part of two years, and would have the double advantage of dealing effectively with the housing problem and with unemployment simultaneously.

A. T., Brockport, N. Y., writes: "The effort of the Christian Herald to mobilize the influence of the churches of our country and bring it to bear upon the Disarmament Conference, is surely worthy of the support of all who desire to line up on the side of humanity, who hope for the cessation of war, and who are even yet looking forward to that 'Federation of the world,' which, thus far, has been only a poet's dream. If, however, we would do our utmost to promote right action at the Conference, why limit our effort to the churches of America? Will the expression of opinion on the part of one people, no matter how strong that expression may be, carry sufficient weight to be conclusive in the Conference? Do not the leaders of other peoples need to feel the same influence we are seeking to develop, even more than our own? Can not the Christian Herald start a similar movement among the churches of England, France, Italy and all the other peoples who will participate in the Conference, so that the representatives of each nation shall feel the weight and urge of the sentiment of its own people, and there shall roll up from all directions such a tide of public opinion that nothing can resist it?"

Interest in the Disarmament Conference is by no means confined to the American churches. We have news of a strong movement in the British churches and their allied organizations, with the same end in view. These will no doubt be forwarded to the Conference by the British delegates. The Continental churches, though largely of another faith, may also be heard from through their delegates.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published weekly by the Christian Herald, at the Bible House, Fourth Avenue, 8th and 9th Sts., New York City. The Officers are Graham C. Patterson, President and Treasurer; Geo. H. Sandison, Vice-President; R. D. Henkle, Secretary.

EVERY BIBLE READER SHOULD READ THIS BOOK

"PROPHECY EXPLAINED"

By GEORGE H. PATCH

1 Vol. 12mo. Cloth
(size, 7½ x 5 ins.)
480 Pages of Large Type

THESE interpretations or conclusions will be welcomed by all who love God's Word, and the more so as the author, with fine skill and scholarship, supports every one of his interpretations with the Word itself. Thus the Bible becomes its own interpreter and new force is given to the command to "Search the Scriptures."

While writing "Prophecy Explained," the author had two objects in view: he desired, first of all, to give the Bible's own teaching on the Prophecies—those already fulfilled, those in process of fulfilment, and those to be fulfilled in the future. He knew that the Church as a whole had become apathetic in regard to prophetic subjects and that the ministry had relegated them to the realm of things unsolvable, forgetful of the fact that in both the Jewish and the early Christian churches the study of Prophecy was held as of highest importance. To reawaken the interest in that long neglected study was his great desire. Where now but a small minority of professing Christians know even the bare outlines of Prophecy, he believes that, rightly presented, it would command the earnest attention of multitudes and would bring into their lives a new and powerful inspiration, and an experience nobler and more spiritually elevating than they could ever have conceived. With this end in view he has put the outcome of his years of reverent study into this single volume, which covers the whole field of Prophecy and clears away all difficulties in a manner that appeals to the reader. The book is a series of 52 studies. It is so planned as to be available either for the individual reader in the quietude of his home, for the Family Circle, or for the class in Church or Sunday School.

We submitted the manuscript to leading Bible teachers and it has received their heartiest commendation.

Covers the whole field of Prophecy and clears away all difficulties

"This excellent book appears opportunely at a time when, more than in any previous period in modern history, Prophecy is uppermost in the minds of thoughtful men and women throughout the world. This is a wonderful book on Prophecy. It will be welcomed by Christian men and women everywhere. It brings solace and consolation and reassurance."

"Mr. Patch has shed flood of light on prophecy and especially on Revelation. His work cannot fail to be commended by Bible students and Christian people wherever the Bible is read and studied. It is the most important book we have ever published on Prophecy."—Dr. George H. Sandison.

The Beautiful 1922 Scripture Text Calendar

and Thoughts for Daily Meditation is ready for Mailing

DAILY WORDS OF CHEER

The Scripture Text Calendar for 1922, with its combination of the beauties of art with the daily words of inspiration from the Bible, will, we think, meet with general approval. The art work, including both the front page and the inside pictures, is reproduced in the beautiful four-color process printing.

A reproduction of the famous painting, "Master, I Perish," is the principal feature of the cover design of the Scripture Text Calendar.

As an adornment for the walls of the home, this famous picture, artistically adapted to the cover design of the Scripture Text Calendar for 1922, is one which speaks eloquently, conveying to the beholder a suggestion of hope and good cheer.

TWELVE WORKS OF ART

Besides the cover design, the calendar contains a four-color picture for each month.

We will send the Christian Herald for one year, 52 weeks, and a copy of the Scripture Text Calendar both postpaid for only..... $2.20

We will send extra copies of the Calendar, postpaid, for 35c a copy.

By referring to the Scripture Text Calendar you can tell what the Sunday School Lesson will be for any Sunday in 1922—an aid to the busy teacher.

A 200-YEAR CALENDAR

On the back of the Calendar is a 200-Year Calendar, by the use of which you can locate the day of the week on which you were born, or any important event in recent history; in fact, the dates within two centuries. A table of the Easter Sundays between 1860 and 1955 is given; also a table showing Standard Time Around the World. These educational features add to the practical utility of the calendar and enhance its value to old and young.

Eminent Food Authorities give the real reason for the remarkable nation-wide popularity of Karo

In a recent advertising campaign on Karo it was mentioned:

"Food experts are just realizing the energy-producing value of Karo and why it is such a wonderful food.

It is because Karo contains a very large percentage of dextrose—and is itself in a form to be most easily digested and absorbed into the system.

"You could not live long without dextrose. The starch and sugar in all the food you eat—bread, vegetables, potatoes—must be changed into dextrose before your system can use it as an energy food.

"So Karo may almost be said to be a predigested food.

"These are scientific facts, supported by the very highest medical and food authorities."

These facts are now becoming so well known by the general public that they must interest all the mothers and fathers in the land who want to see their children well-nourished and sturdy—with plenty of vigor and vitality for all their little needs of play, study and growth.

What applies to children applies to grown-ups as well—who aspire to keep in the "pink of condition"—fit for every duty or emergency of life.

Not only is dextrose found in Karo, but it is also found in sweet fruits, such as grapes, and in nourishing grains and roots.

Dextrose becomes the principal form of carbohydrate after the food is prepared for absorption by the system.

It is a well known fact that children need more food than adults. Their active life and more rapid growth demand, in proportion to their weight, just about twice the amount of food a grown person needs. A child uses up a lot of vitality in active play and study. This explains the perfectly natural craving of almost every normal child for a wholesome sweet like Karo.

Give the youngsters plenty of Karo—spread on bread. It's a great energy food.

A remarkable health-building food

SO at last we know, on scientific grounds, why millions of people have found Karo to be such a remarkable health-building food, and why the sale of Karo last year exceeded two hundred million cans.

It is because Karo has in it the very elements that the greatest doctors are now finding out are not only necessary—but absolutely indispensable—for building and preserving health.

So keep Karo on the table. Eat plenty of Karo yourself—on pancakes, biscuits, and use it for a cooking purposes.

Give the children all their systems demand—as a spread on bread, or stewed with dried fruit and prunes, and in other appetizing ways.

In this way both you and the children will be healthier and stronger.

For Your Protection

DO not be deceived by cans containing syrup that might look like Karo. The name "Karo" is on every can of original Karo—look for it, and be assured of full weight cans and highest quality.

BLUE KARO—The standard table syrup. Also for cooking, baking and candy-making. Light brown color, delicious flavor—a heavy-bodied syrup.

RED KARO—The Ideal Syrup for every use—for cooking, baking, candy-making and preserving. Because of its honey-like appearance many prefer it as a spread for cakes, biscuits, breads.

GREEN KARO—Flavored with the highest grade real maple sugar. Very moderate in price—absolutely pure. The makers of Karo are the world's largest users of the highest grade maple sugar—over a thousand tons used annually.

Put a Prop in Prohibition

Some Plain Statements on Laxity in Enforcement and the Responsibility for This Situation

By RAE D. HENKLE

THERE was another change in the head of the prohibition enforcement machinery in New York a few days ago and the metropolitan newspapers turned many a witty paragraph on the extremely attenuated term of any man who comes into the territory of big bootlegging profits with any idea of really enforcing the law. The fact that in the last year and nine months there has been a pretty constant procession of enforcement directors moving in and out of New York's prohibition headquarters is regarded not so much a crucifixion of the very fundamentals of law and democracy as a good joke on the "fanatics" who are trying to "put over on us" a law which the part of New York does not like.

On the announcement of the most recent shift in directions one of the wealthiest and best known of our local bootleggers—as certain prominent journals might aptly phrase it—was quoted something in this wise: "Him? The bigger they are the harder they fall! We'll get him!"

So, as can be judged, the life of a national prohibition enforcement officer in one of the outstandingly "wet" spots is not exactly a long round of pleasure. He takes chances with comfort, reputation, and even life itself. He is certain to lose the former under the strenuousness of his activities. His reputation, no matter how impeccable, will be smirched by calumnies, usually baseless. And another's life, to the man who weighs it against the profit in a barrel of whiskey, is worth less than the bullet in his pistol.

Now, because Congress couldn't stop its splitting of hairs over technicalities and its quarreling over "personal liberty," the bars are down for wine and beer, and just so much additional burden has been placed on the men who are trying sincerely and conscientiously to enforce the constitutional prohibition of intoxicating liquors. It is another case of the ell that grew into a mile. With no limit beyond the physician's discretion to prescribe the consumption of malt and wine there is grave danger of the whole ideal of prohibition being so thoroughly emasculated and flouted as to make it unrecognizable.

THESE are all things that the average man and woman knows. What is the cause, however, and what is the remedy? Does it lie in the suggestion of the editor of one of the big denominational temperance organs?

"On several occasions recently," this journal says, "prohibition and police officers in the discharge of their duty have been fired upon by bootleggers. Unfortunately some of these belligerent bootleggers have been taken and lodged in jail; they should have been lodged five feet under ground."

Commenting on an arrest in which there had been sharp fighting the publication continued:

"This is not good policy. Such incidents should be dealt with according to the code of the Texas Ranger. We would be the last to advocate the unwarranted use of weapons by officers, but a bootlegger is worth a lot more to the country dead than alive."

Granted the latter premise, have the people of the United States reached the point where one of its religious agencies is justified in thus publicly appealing to lynch law? Is it necessary that we resort to lawlessness to combat lawlessness? If so, what is the American future?

It seems to this writer that there is much more logical solution to the problem and one that at the same time is simple as

A-B-C. Here it is in a sentence: Demand that prohibition be enforced!

We demanded that prohibitory legislation be passed, and it was Somehow or other we regarded our job as ended there. Well, it isn't over—far from it—and won't be for a long time to come, even with the utmost enthusiasm in carrying it forward. Demand now that prohibition be enforced!

Any man who follows politics locally can find an analogy to the situation. In every community there is a certain small group of men who are "in politics." They give all or most of their time to politics because they find it pays either in money or pride—perhaps both. And, because they give the best part of their time to it they have things pretty much their own way. The chances are you never appeared at a party convention when conventions were in fashion, never helped select the delegates, and took only a passing interest in the result when the shouting was all over and the newspapers told you the nominees. In these days of primaries the chances are you adopt the line of least resistance and accept with a slight mental reservation or two the choice of nominees advanced by the party leaders. It is a safe estimate to say that this analysis of political activity is applicable to eighty per cent. of the American people. This eighty per cent. is perfectly willing to let the twenty per cent. who have some pecuniary or other direct interest in politics choose the public officials, and then it objects because there are crying evils in the administration of law or corruptness in the conduct of public business.

THAT is exactly the situation with reference to the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment today. There are too many theoretical prohibitionists and not enough who believe so thoroughly in the principle that they will go out and fight for it.

There is no reason to mince words in saying that large numbers of church members are scoffing at and disobeying the prohibition law and thus are conniving at and encouraging mob violence, murder, bribery and anarchy. Dismiss for the moment the question of how good church members these individuals are. I know some who are in the best official standing, yet they see violations of the law under their very noses and persist in regarding the occurrences as none of their particular business and, in some cases, as a bit of a joke.

A few days ago a man of standing in his church and community was sitting by my desk and we were talking about prohibition enforcement.

"It is astonishing," he said, "how openly liquor can be bought. I was at dinner the other evening in the—restaurant, and the waiter served a party at an adjoining table without the least effort to disguise the fact that it was a whiskey highball he was serving."

"What did you do about it," I asked.

"What could I do about it," he countered.

"Did you speak to the manager," I inquired.

"That would have done no good and I would have been laughed at for my pains," he explained.

"Did you mention it to the policeman on the beat?"

"And be hustled along by him?"

"There is a prohibition enforcement officer in the town. Why didn't you go to him the next day, tell him what you saw and that obviously liquor was served in the place as a matter of routine. He might have thanked you for the information."

This isn't a hollow tree in a moonshiner's camp but a hiding-place aboard a ship which is coming into the port of New York with contraband goods in its hold.

My acquaintance hesitated and had the grace to blush faintly.

"I know," he answered presently. "I should have done one, or all these things. But you know how it is. I didn't want to cause a disturbance there, and it would have put me out a good bit to go to the enforcement office. Besides, what good would it have done? They might have scared this place into selling under cover for a few days, and then things would have drifted back into the same old way. It's no use."

He was a prohibitionist, but not when it interfered in the slightest with his sense of dignified demeanor in public or the routine of his life in the office. There are probably twenty-five million other people like him in the country.

THE sale of alcoholic liquor for beverage purposes in the United States is against the law. It is a felony. Murder is a felony. If you see another man commit murder or conspire to commit murder and do not exert your utmost efforts to prevent him, you are held before the law and your conscience as a compounder of crime. You are not excused because you were too busy to bother about it or were fearful of some annoying publicity or personal inconvenience. Precisely the same principle applies in the enforcement of prohibition, and no amount of sophistry and evasive arguments can get away from it. It is every man's business, whether he is a police officer or not, to see that the laws are enforced.

One of the greatest problems the United States has to face today is this one of law enforcement—prohibition or any other law. This is no alarmist call, but the fact remains that regard for law generally is suffering from a serious form of anemia. The nation that fails to enforce its laws is on the first stage toward collapse. And the less resistance it shows toward this tendency to laxity the faster will be its decline. Its self-respect goes first and then follows the contempt of the rest of the world.

Already Great Britain and the European continent where the next big prohibition fight will develop are looking at us with their tongues in their cheeks. The comic journals and many of the newspapers and serious reviews are finding little of serious portent in our prohibition protestations.

"Certainly," is the tenor of their comments. "We could have a prohibitory law, too, if we were willing to enforce it like you do. Over here, however, we are used to enforcing our laws."

They have been watching the United States in the last year and three-quarters. We engaged, with what appeared to be remarkable unanimity, in a great moral, economic and social reform incomparable in history. We engaged in it after a campaign of education and preparation extending across half a century and with the eyes of the world upon us, sceptically, it must be admitted, for the most part.

Is there a pride in our strength of purpose, in the righteousness of the cause, in our ability to go through successfully with a job, that will compel us to effect the reform to which we have committed ourselves before the world? A nation's pride is something. Is it more worth while to go to war to resent a slap on the cheek than to gird ourselves and fight to protect a name for sobriety, moral cleanliness and civic decency?

When Marshal Foch, commander-in-chief of the Allied Armies, reached this country for an extended tour he announced that so long as he was in the United States he would be a teetotaler. Marshal Foch comes from a wine-drinking nation. He comes from a people that look on wine as they look on water: as a part of their daily routine. Yet he will not touch alcoholic drink, in public or in private, so long as he remains on these shores. He says frankly he expects to obey the law of the land.

IS THAT an example that will shame any number of Americans into an attitude of observance of the law that they, themselves, helped to frame and place in the Constitution?

A group of us were sitting together the other evening when the conversation drifted around, as it invariably does in New York before an evening is over, to prohibition.

"I really am surprised," said one of the group, "at the amount of drinking around the club these days. No one there would ever suspect we are living in prohibition days."

That started a discussion on the whole question of law observance which eventually came about to this specific club and the reasons for a condition that all of the members had noted with growing concern.

"Tell us frankly why you don't do something about it," we urged the man who brought up the topic.

"Oh, I don't know," he said. "You know how it is. I—" and he stopped for a moment. "Yes," he continued emphatically, "I'll tell you. I haven't the moral courage to make an issue of it. It is a sorry confession, but it's the truth. The men in the club are all my friends. I like them and I think most of them like me. If I started something and tried to prevent their 'locker system,' or deprive them of their drink by some other means they would make it so uncomfortable for me I would have to resign from the club. I have belonged there for nearly twenty-five years and it is a second home to me. I don't drink. I believe in prohibition. But I haven't got the nerve to start trouble because of it."

This man is a lawyer of some prominence. He is a substantial citizen and an officer in his church. And five out of this little group of seven sympathized with him and agreed that it would require more moral courage than they possessed to go into their club and single-handed begin a fight for law enforcement.

That is the attitude that confronts the entire enforcement machinery of the government. Do you think for a moment that if the nearly fifty million enrolled church members of the United States were actively determined that prohibition legislation be enforced there would be any question of its enforcement? You know well what would happen. The country would be as dry as the famed Sahara desert before the end of a month.

Most of these observations have been written from the viewpoint of the larger centers of population. How much different are conditions in the smaller communities? How many places are there in your village where liquor can be obtained? The Christian Herald receives letters every week from good men and women telling of conditions in their towns and asking what can be done to drive out the "blind pig," the "speak-easy," the secret still and occasionally the open bar. There is nothing can be done from the office of the magazine but refer the inquirer to the nearest enforcement officer and urge prompt and cordial co-operation with him in his efforts to wipe out the plague spots. Commercialized law debauchery is not the problem in the smaller community that it is in the cities because the opportunity for large money profits lies alongside the large money supplies and they are found in the larger centers. A canvass of smaller towns in all sections of the country, however, shows conclusively that the problem is there in just the same ratio of criminal possibilities. The danger is present and it is as menacing to the morals and the moral consciousness of the citizenship.

IT IS safe to say that at no time in the history of the temperance fight has there been a more deft, and consequently a more insidious propaganda in favor of liquor than is under way at this time. Billions of dollars can be made by the liquor interests and the men behind them if the law can be emasculated by legislative action, or if the public by a continued apathy consents to its becoming a dead letter. For certain types of men that lure of gold blinds them to every other thought. It is the task of the right-thinking people now to see that these billions of dollars continue to flow in increasing volume into the savings banks into home properties, into better food, more thorough education, more good literature, more home and foreign missionary support and more healthful recreation instead of into the coffers of the distiller and the dishonest politician who unfortunately still exists in some places.

Wayne B. Wheeler, legal representative of the Anti-Saloon League, in a strong appeal for support in the enforcement fight, says:

"The liquor interests refuse to obey the law and patriots must not surrender to lawlessness.

"Thirty wet organizations are working to defy, repeal or weaken the enforcement code.

"A minority in the United States Senate is willing to use the un-American filibuster to prevent the vote of the majority for law-enforcement legislation.

"Many people do not yet realize that in scoffing at and disobeying the prohibition law they are encouraging anarchy, mob violence and murder.

"The sensational news item about the violation of law is still given more publicity than the facts about the good results of prohibition.

(The Christian Herald is now planning for an early number a comprehensive article on the wonderful results of prohibition.)

"The work yet to be done is essential to final victory. The public must be educated to reverence law, to sacrifice for the public good, to condemn lawlessness, to require a higher degree of efficiency and integrity in its public officials and to take as large a hand in their own government as they do in their private business."

In connection with the next to the last paragraph in Mr. Wheeler's appeal it is interesting to note that out of all the great newspapers in New York City, only two have been supporting the cause of law enforcement so far as the law applies to prohibition. These two are the Evening Mail and the New York Evening Post. The attitude of all the rest ranges from frank and outspoken opposition to enforcement and encouragement to lawlessness, to a cynical amusement that attempts should be made to enforce prohibitory measures. The great mass of the people of the city are mentally so constituted that they prefer to let the newspapers do most of their thinking for them, so it is not strange that New York should be provoked to cheers by each successive announcement of the failure of the latest enforcement director.

NEW YORK, moreover, is not alone as an example of American citizens applauding law-breaking. There is the same attitude in your town as there is in New York, but because it is not so strongly manifested numerically it cannot produce so much noise.

The best part of it all is, however, that the liquor clique in itself is a small minority. It makes itself heard only because the people who are thinking straight are taking it out in thinking and hesitate like my friend of the club, to come out in public, applaud the officials who are doing their duty and make the weight of their influence felt.

The story is going the rounds in New York of one of the most eminent jurists in the country who attended a very "wet" dinner at a New York hotel a few weeks ago. The jurist was one of the most flagrant of the offenders at the dinner during which some $30,000 worth of contraband liquor was consumed between evening and morning. The occasion was semi-public and the circumstances seem to be well known. Yet he continues on the bench and large numbers of persons arrested for violation of the liquor laws are coming before him constantly for arraignment and trial. In fact a few days after the event in New York the newspapers of the country published quite long dispatches quoting him on his veneration for the law and the passion that possesses him to make it respected to the last comma and period.

The great majority of the American people want prohibition. They want it honestly and earnestly. They can have it if they are willing to inconvenience themselves to get it. The results so far recorded for which the eighteenth amendment is responsible are so big and vital to the future of the country that no normal thinking person can contemplate the possibility of a return to the booze days.

We know, as confidently as we can know anything mortal, that the prohibition amendment is in the Constitution to stay. But we know something else with almost equal certainty: Its effectiveness will be nullified if the good people of the country continue their failure to assert themselves with regard to it.

Beer and Wine Regulations Soon to Go

By FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

THE Church and the temperance people of the nation need not get panicky or even uneasy about the decision of Secretary Mellon to allow beer and wines to be dispensed as medicine, as this ruling, manifestly against the spirit of the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution, will be but short-lived.

The Senate in a test vote recently declared against this proposition by a vote of two to one, the House having previously protested by at least a three-fourths majority. And the action by the compromise committee of the House and Senate in the supplemental Volstead bill seems sure to be adopted by the Senate just as soon as a vote can be taken upon it, which certainly will be before the present Congress, elected upon a dry platform, shall have ended its session.

The leading druggists of America are protesting against being made partners of the bootleggers, and the Medical Association of America has declared against the use even of spirits as a medicine, which is allowed by law, because its members say that other remedies which have no habit-forming danger will do just as well as alcohol. And the leaders in the great national Surgeons' Convention, in Philadelphia, the other day, said that the medical profession was in danger of being dragged down into the mire of dishonor by being thus linked with the bootleggers in their attempt to dispense intoxicating drink.

The beer and wine question has been fought out in nearly every state in the Union in the legislatures and in the local contests, as well as in the sessions of Congress. And beer and wines have been thrown out by the votes of the people. This is not a new question forced upon the public, but one that has been fought for a quarter of a century, up to the present. Beer and wine could not be saved in this conflict, because the men that made the beer for the saloons owned eight-tenths of the saloons themselves, and wine and beer are counted by science, as well as by the moral reformers, to be very dangerous beverages which deserve to be cast out with the strong spirits.

There never was a sublimer piece of sarcasm than for members of the United States Senate and editors of newspapers to fret about the putting of the Fourth Amendment against the Eighteenth Amendment, and the filibuster which prevented the vote and the elimination of wine and beer through the supplemental Volstead bill illustrated the disloyalty of those leaders to our free institutions, when they knew that the action of the Senate would be for the prohibition of beer and wine. Our republic, in a constitutional way, has ordered the destruction of the liquor traffic, and it is time for newspapers and political leaders and those who prize their appetite for drink more than they do the public good, to surrender to the voice of the people and obey the voice of God.

The Church and the Motion-Picture

Films Can Be Made Which Carry the Gospel Message

By JAMES K. SHIELDS

Author of "The Stream of Life"

SIGHT is the most precious sense. We pity the one who is blind more than the one who is both deaf and dumb, because the most direct and the most traveled way to the soul is through the gateway of the eye. We would rather see the person, than to hear some one tell of him; to behold the scene, than to hear it described.

The phonograph faithfully records the sound, the cinematograph, the appearance. They obey strictly the laws of science; they know neither good nor evil. Each is faithful in recording that which is presented to it to record.

Unfortunately, greed has seized upon the moving-picture machine and has monopolized its use to such an extent that the Church has allowed itself to become prejudiced against an instrument which holds the greatest possibilities of spreading abroad the fundamental principles and teachings of the Gospel.

Can the Gospel be preached through the moving-picture? Undoubtedly there are multitudes, and among them the best people of the world, who are ready to say emphatically, "No! it belongs to the devil." But, let us not be too hasty.

A six-reel motion-picture was shown in a prominent Broadway theater in New York City at the noon hour to men every day for a week. The audience was composed of perhaps fifteen hundred to two thousand men of every creed and nationality.

The story had been written and filmed with a dominating purpose of visualizing the need of every man and woman to have faith in God in order to meet the crises that of necessity come into every human life. A musical score had been fitted to the picture and lent interpretation to the scenes; many old, familiar songs and hymns being used.

As the last scene faded out, the lights were turned on and a minister stepped quickly to the platform and with uplifted hand said: "Just a minute, boys, before you go. In the last hour and a half you fellows have had to take stock of your spiritual possessions, and a lot of you are short and you know it. How many of you feel that you would like to have some one pray for you before you leave this house?"

Instantly, without a moment's hesitation, eight hundred men raised their hands. On the preceding day, at a similar hour and under similar circumstances, five hundred men did the same thing. This minister said, after witnessing these scenes: "There is not a man in the world, bishop or evangelist, who can take a mixed audience composed of just the ordinary crowd of men who throng Broadway and in an hour and a half produce in them a state of mind that would lead eight hundred of them to ask for prayer."

THIS same picture had been shown to an audience that filled to its utmost capacity and standing-room one of the largest churches in Des Moines, Iowa. At the close a plea was made for a surrendered life and responded to by twenty persons. Then a plea was made for parents to establish a family altar, such as had been portrayed in the story before them, and the fathers and mothers of fifteen different homes responded by standing up together. This was followed by still another appeal for a greater activity in Christian service on the part of those church members who had been indifferent, and scores of people arose all over the house.

After showing it in a large church in Springfield, Mass., on a Saturday night, the pastor of the church related how on the succeeding Sunday morning one of the leading business men of that city came to him and said, "Well, pastor, after seeing that picture last night, I re-established my family altar this morning after a lapse of ten years."

Scores of similar experiences could be related.

Now let us turn to testimony from another source. One of the largest moving-picture distributing corporations, hearing of this picture requested that they might review it, looking to its national distribution.

They were frankly told of its strong religious appeal, but insisted and said, "We want better pictures, pictures with a real message." It was rejected, however. After admitting that the photography was beautiful and the action good, the manager added, "But, the—thing is preaching at you all the time, and people do not go to the theater to be preached at, they go there to be entertained." He was told that such a criticism was one of the strongest testimonies to the real purpose of the picture yet given.

YES, the moving-picture can be made to preach, and to preach acceptably and effectively and even powerfully. This does not mean that it will take the place of the living preacher, for it never will, but it does mean that it can be used by the church in reaching with a real message multitudes that do not now attend the House of God.

A wealthy Chicago layman said, "If there are twenty-five such pictures I would equip my church with the best projecting machine on the market, and, instead of my pastor looking around on a Sunday evening with a magnifying glass to find the members of his congregation, the ushers would need the magnifying glass to find places to seat them, and they would go away inspired to a nobler living."

All too long has the church neglected to appropriate and develop the greatest agency ever known for drawing together large numbers of people and putting it into the service of the Kingdom.

In advocating pictures for church services, we wish to be understood that such pictures must be made from the Church's point of view. Second-hand pictures will not answer, and by second-hand we mean those pictures that have run their course through the regular theaters and then, after they are no longer a financial asset, have been expurgated by cutting out immoral or suggestive parts. Some splendid week-day reels, for the purpose of entertainment, undoubtedly can and have been secured by this method, but the Sunday evening picture must be a Gospel picture; it must radiate an influence and carry a message of divine truth and drive it home. It must be prepared in the same spirit with which a minister prepares his sermon—to do good and not to make money, must dominate the heart of the writer.

Neither preacher nor writer, however, will succeed who expresses his thought in a dry and uninteresting manner. Mediocrity will not be forgiven in the church any more than in a theater. The picture should arouse the memory of the best and the sweetest things in life. It must be purged of all that is melodramatic and unreal. It must portray those things that can happen and do happen; it must be presented in modern dress and experience. Such pictures can and should have the widest range of wholesome humor, deep pathos and true love. The church picture, from the standpoint of artistry and execution, must be the equal of any to be seen in the picture palace downtown.

THE organ, the greatest of all musical instruments—once looked upon by church folks as the "devil's own"—never came to its best until it entered the sanctuary to thrill and inspire the people with its divine melody in its interpretation of spiritual aspiration. But who, having heard the organ and the cinematograph working together in perfect harmony, has not felt that they are as naturally wed one to the other as the bird's song is to the springtime? And they will yet be working together for the glory of God.

We have our preaching evangelists, and our singing evangelists, and we will one day have our picture evangelists, men and women who will, with the same divine consecration, pour the heart of the Gospel into simple stories and great dramas for the screen that will draw and grip the hearts of thousands and millions that the preaching and singing evangelists can never reach because of their physical limitations.

How often have you said, "I wish everybody might have heard that sermon." Visualize it and the multitudes may see it and feel its power and get its blessing. Do you object?

There are, of course, many difficulties in the way of a moving-picture in the church besides that of the natural prejudice on the part of many people. Second-hand machines, second-hand operators, and second-hand music will have to be encountered by those who pioneer in this kind of service, and most of the things that go wrong will be blamed upon the picture, rather than upon the way in which it is handled.

Then again, greater than the difficulties of producing church pictures of the right kind, is the problem of distribution. The theatrical exchanges naturally do not want them; there is no money in them in comparison with the kind that they are in the habit of handling. The non-theatrical exchanges see more money in pictures of another kind.

The number of churches, however, that are catching the vision of the possibilities in motion-pictures is increasing rapidly, and the production and distribution of gospel pictures will in time become a distinct department of Christian service and activity. When the Church wakes up to its real opportunity, our congregations will not be slipping away to the Sunday night theater and picture-house, but will be looking forward with pleasure and inviting their friends to join them in a beautiful and uplifting service in their home church.

Our Readers Farthest North

"I should have written long ago about my subscription to the Christian Herald. I feel that I cannot give it up. I wonder if you have any other subscribers in this corner of the globe. My husband and I live on an island called Ingo, which has only a few hundred inhabitants. We are just a few miles from the North Cape and we have been engaged in Christian work among the Finns. This family lives in Alten, eighteen hours by steamer from Ingo. They have a tent and a little house, but most Finns live in mud huts, in which goats, dogs, babies and grown-ups are to be found in one grand mix-up. The Finns have herds of reindeer. These they slaughter, sell the venison and use the skins for making moccasins and other articles.

"We met the Finns at a conference in Troniso in 1919. My husband spoke to them through an interpreter, and when he told them of our purpose and showed them on the map how far we had come and convinced them that we were interested in them they became very much excited and enthusiastic. They are a very emotional people and fond of gay colors. When I told this family that I wished to take their photograph they ran instantly for their gay shawls. I'm sorry the colors can not be seen—bright red, blue and yellow."

In the Black Hours of Ismid's Fall

An Account of the Heroism of American Women in Asia Minor

WHEN the wreck of the city of Ismid was taken by the Turkish Nationalists under Mustapha Kemal at the beginning of July, the story was flashed around the world by wireless from the warships of the nations standing off-shore umpiring the game, but the story of Dr. Mabel Elliott and her nurses, Mrs. Mabel Powers, Miss Leila Priest and Miss Griselle MacClaren—four American women—and nineteen native girls stationed at the American Women's Hospitals on the hill beyond the city, has not yet been told.

It is nothing new for Ismid to fall. Like many other cities in this ancient land, it has been rising and falling for ages. It was the old Necomedia and rose to great power as the capital of Byzantium, and fell and rose again, and after many centuries of "ups and downs" under different conquerors and rulers, finally fell into the hands of the Kemalists.

Of course, there was a massacre. The fall of a city without a massacre would disappoint the proudest traditions of the country—and the Turk is not alone when it comes to maintaining traditions. Do unto your enemy as he would do unto you, and do it when you get the chance. This is the prevailing idea. Let him be robbed and murdered—cut off root and branch. This is always pious and patriotic, and sometimes profitable.

On this occasion the Greeks had their innings first. About twenty thousand Greek soldiers had been stationed at Ismid. These had been withdrawn to strengthen the Brousa front and the small force left was unable to hold the city when it was attacked by the Kemalists. What was to be done? The usual thing. Get away with the valuables. (One American woman saved her bath-tub at considerable risk—it was her most precious possession.) Then, burn, sack, massacre the enemy inhabitants of the city, and evacuate. It was reported that the refugees had been given arms to protect themselves and that they believed in prevention.

NO OUTSIDER can pass judgment upon these things. Self-preservation is a primal law. It is a case of safety first and the survival of the one who strikes the swiftest, surest blow. A dead enemy does no immediate damage. He does not lie in ambush and stab you in the back. Therefore, from the standpoint of those vitally interested, the Greeks merely took the necessary and time-honored precaution in the evacuation of the City of Ismid.

There were between thirty and forty thousand Greek and Armenian refugees to be gotten safely away before the Greek troops withdrew. Many of these had suffered deportation during the earlier years of the war, and had returned after the armistice when Ismid was occupied by the British forces and seemed about the safest place in the country. These unfortunate people had witnessed massacres over and over again. Suffering and humiliation had been their daily portion during their exile; these experiences seemed about to be repeated; naturally they were terror-stricken and ran through the streets toward the wharfs on the water-front, screaming and praying and expecting every minute to feel a knife at their throats.

But all was quiet in the heart of the city. By the light of the burning buildings, the refugees were crowded, packed and jammed onto the Greek boats in the harbor, after which the Greek troops embarked and steamed away and left Ismid, the old city of Necomedia, to the Kemalites, a new force of military conquerors.

Then the Chetas (Turkish bandits) came down from the hills to glean, as it were, and finished up any stragglers they were able to find along the way. These Chetas are interesting gentry. From time immemorial refugees from falling cities have been in the habit of swallowing the family jewels. This practice has added zest and variety—class as it were—to common highway robbery and murder, for no enterprising Cheta feels that he has done a good job unless he has gone through the internal organs of his victim in search of loot.

ABOUT a year ago, the American Women's Hospitals and the Near East Relief Committee adopted a co-operative scheme for the purpose of conducting a medical relief center. Trebizond was tentatively agreed upon as the field of operation, but owing to the military activities of the Bolsheviks and the Kemalists in that region, the plan was changed and Ismid was selected because it seemed so safe and peaceful, and the need for work was very great on account of the large number of exiles and refugees who had gone there after the armistice.

Dr. Mabel E. Elliott of the American Women's Hospitals was appointed director of this work. She is a beautiful woman, slender, strong and straight in stature, with a serene cast of countenance and snow-white hair—it is whiter now than when she came to this country three years ago. She is used to deportations, abductions, evacuations and massacres. She was in charge of a hospital at Marash during the ISMID is a city of Asia Minor at the head of the Gulf of Ismid, an inlet forming the eastern extremity of the Sea of Marmora, and is fifty-six miles southeast of Constantinople. Since its possession is essential in any attempt to advance on the Turkish capital from the Asiatic side, it was a prize highly desired by both the Turkish Nationalists and the Greeks in their recent fighting. The scenes attending one of the captures of Ismid and the heroism of a group of American women engaged in relief work there are graphically described by Dr. Lovejoy in the accompanying article.

Turkish siege in January and February, 1920. The city was finally taken by the Turkish forces, and the people with whom she had been working were scattered to the four winds—but her work was not lost. It was spread broadcast by the disaster. She had not wrought with brick and stone, but with plastic human materials, and the refugees who had had the luck to serve with her found within themselves fountains of wealth of which they could not be robbed, but upon which they could draw and give to others and grow richer themselves in the giving.

The young women belonging to Doctor Elliott's training class for nurses did not suffer the usual fate of refugees. They were not obliged to beg and live on charity in the refugee camps, or submit to even greater humiliation. They had more than common labor and sex value. As soon as it was found that they were able to care for the sick, they were called to serve in the different towns where Fate had placed them. Four of these girls were taken to Beirut, and before they had been in the city forty-eight hours they were called for service in the Syrian hospital.

The American Women's Hospitals is the center of an important hospital and dispensary service. In the general hospital there are eighty beds for medical and surgical cases; there is a separate trachoma hospital where one hundred and twenty-five little girls are treated for this painful, eye-destroying malady; typhus and other contagious diseases have been prevalent during the winter and spring months; there are refugees camps and small-pox and tuberculosis camps besides the dispensaries where thousands of people were treated monthly.

THIS hospital stands upon the hillside above the harbor. It was within sight and hearing of the confusion and carnage incident to the battle and evacuation of Ismid. But in spirit it stood five thousand miles apart—an American refuge for the sick and injured regardless of religion or nationality. There are no separate wards for Greeks and Turks and Armenians. There they lie in one big ward with their gun-shot wounds and broken legs, and the American flag floats over them. They look alike to the woman in charge. They are alike. They all belong to the human race. They have plenty of time for reflection, and if they had any sense of humor they would see what jokes they have made of themselves, but the history of warfare would seem to indicate a shortage of humor and reason in the makeup of mankind.

In one of the sacred books of some religion or other, and it seems to me that it is the Koran, there is a prophecy of dire calamity. Punishment is to be visited upon certain sinners and after passing through generations and generations of every grade of degradation, they finally reach the abyss where they are ruled over by women. The prophecy has been fulfilled, and strange as it may seem, these poor fellows who have taken all the grades have fallen so low that they actually like the change.

The American Women's Hospital is manned by women. It has an atmosphere. It reflects the serene and saving grace of the American woman in charge. During the recent trouble every woman was at her post. Even the native girls in training only six months maintained perfect discipline, caring for the sick and wounded, friend and enemy alike. They did not flee for their lives, but when the last boat was leaving and their duty was done then they withdrew in order like good soldiers.

THE following letter written by Dr. Elliott on July 4, to one of her nurses gives a vivid description of the evacuation of Ismid:

"Dear Anne:

"All this time and no letter from you, but we've been through a bad time. I'm so glad you got out—that is one reason I was so anxious for you to go. It is no worse than I expected it would be if the Greeks left, in fact so far it has not been so bad—only the strain, the madness and the work! And I knew you were not well enough to go through with it.

"In the first place, Madame Nicolirare, the Colonel's wife, went from bad to worse, and I was determined I would save her if I could. I stayed up until forty-three two nights running and several nights made midnight calls. Finally she went entirely bad and that night I did not go to bed at all. She died at four, and we had an awful time. He went to pieces and screamed so loud that everybody thought a massacre had been started.

"On top of all this the Eleventh division got their orders to move out and take the refugees with them. Later it was decided to leave the refugees here and send three thousand new men to protect the town.

The new men came and the old division, bag and baggage, moved out. They marched around the gulf to Bardazag a week ago Thursday. It was so hard to see them go—our nice friends! Doctor A. came for the last time on Tuesday and brought his violin and played and played as he never had played before.

"The plan was for the eleventh division to form the left wing of the Brousa front so the entire division crossed straight over on the Brousa-Bardazag Road, but the Turks met them at Bardazag, artillery and everything from Adebazar, Sabange and the whole Ismid front, and what is more they held them and they didn't get by. There were eight gunboats in the harbor besides the Kilos. Friday it was fairly quiet, but all day Saturday and Saturday night there were great fires between Bardazag and Dermardere, and the big guns and all the rest of it were going at a great rate.

"Sunday morning our little game began, as was to be expected with only three thousand soldiers in the town. It broke out on all sides of us. They were fighting between here and our water source and on the hill across from our picnic place. Soon the Kilkos began to shell, and it shook things up, I can tell you. They shelled on all sides and back of the town. The Turks had trenches at Ratched Bey's place where we were working our tractor, and the shells did more plowing in one hour than the tractor did in a week. Wounded were being brought in every few minutes and we had our hands full. The shells passing over the hospital and in other directions shook the place so badly that we had trouble threading our needles in the surgery. Mrs. Powers arrived Friday. It seemed strangely like old times. Just like Marash. You know we went through the siege of Marash together and along she comes from Serbia just in time for the Ismid show. Perhaps she is the one. Is it possible that she attracts the evil eye?"

"About noon the Greeks landed three thousand marines to help out, and in the early evening the commandant signaled the general across the gulf that Ismid was falling and to send help. He came over with three regiments. Monday we heard that the Turks had been massacred, and the Greek general had given the refugees forty-eight hours to get out. Refugees had been pouring in from Adebazer and Sabang, and it looked as though the whole world was made up of refugees. The streets were jammed, the roads were jammed and the cemetery at the foot of our hill was jammed with these frenzied people. The Turkish population was pouring down from the Turkish quarter as terrified as the rest. Later we verified the report of the massacre. It was only too true.

"About two o'clock an American destroyer came down. Jimmie Crutcher was on board. By this time all of our people were getting their pitiful little bundles together. Boat after boat was coming in and they were beginning to load on the refugees. Varsinig left that night. People were continually coming and going and again and again, as at Marash, I heard the despairing question, 'What shall we do now, doctor?'

"I TOLD our girls to sit tight and I would let them know when to go to the boat—and will you believe me, Tuesday morning every girl was in uniform, cap and all, and on duty at seven. Inside the hospital those girls were attending to their duties as though nothing was happening. They were not even looking out of the windows, and on the streets there was a screaming, screeching mass of humanity. Our workers came as they were directed to do, to the place where Miss McClaren was posted, gave the lists of their relatives, got their tickets and went back to their jobs. By supper time we expected to be left with one worker besides Omar (he was a Turk on my pay-roll). Who do you think the other worker was? Poor, faithful old Hagop! He said, 'Doctor stay, Hagop stay'—and that settled it.

"All this time people were coming asking for their sick relatives and I was discharging all I thought would be accepted on the boats. Others were bringing in sick relatives they could not take with them. We had to put a double guard on the small-pox camp, which by the way, we moved up the hill on Friday. This was no small job, I can tell you, with all the disinfecting that had to be done. If some of those people with the small-pox had escaped and gotten on the boats the disease would have been spread broadcast.

"At dark the last boat in sight left the docks and still hundreds of people were there waiting to get off. Pello drove the truck until five o'clock and then went down with his family to take his chances. Other boats came in and people came down to them in droves, pushing, jamming and screaming. Our girls waited on the dock until midnight before they were jammed aboard the last boat, and I could not go down to say a word to them. There was so much to do. In addition to all the other work, a new baby arrived—a fitting climax to the whole tragic business."

THE tragic picture would have been incomplete without the birth of that baby. The dramatic unities were preserved. Fate arranged a perfect setting. The poor little mother was a refugee. Her husband had been killed by the Chetas; her family had fled and at midnight when her baby came, the room was lighted by the burning homes of her people.

From the general hospital we walked down the hill to the Trachoma hospital and attended the morning clinic. One hundred and twenty-five little girls are cared for at this place. Seventy of them were standing in line. Without a whimper one after

The Thanksgiving Spirit

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER

"WHAT does Thanksgiving mean to you?" I asked a certain small boy who is very dear to me. And then, as I saw that he did not quite understand, "What do you think about, first, when somebody speaks of Thanksgiving?" I explained.

The small boy's face became suddenly rapturous. His eyes were saucer-wide, and filled with light.

"I think about dinner," he told me, "turkey, 'n' cranberry sauce, an' punkin pie. I think o' nuts an' rais'ns an' mixed fruit." He sighed ecstatically.

I could not help laughing at him. "And then," I added, "I should imagine that you'd be apt to think of an overcrowded stomach and—perhaps—a headache!"

The small boy looked at me with nothing of comprehension on his face.

"Oh, no," he said, "nothin' like that. Thanksgiving's a happy day!"

NEXT I went to the business girl. She works very hard, does the business girl—she has little time to herself. And she looked up almost impatiently, from her note-book, at my question.

"What does Thanksgiving mean to me?" she asked answering my question, Yankee-fashion, with another—"What does Thanksgiving mean to me? Oh, I reckon it means a day away from the office—that's all! I reckon it means sleeping late in bed, and catching up on my mending, and getting a chance to read a good story. I reckon it means a holiday—a holiday!"

I am afraid that my face was a trifle shocked, as to expression. For the business girl was even farther away from the real spirit of Thanksgiving than the small boy.

"Is that all that it means?" I asked. "Doesn't it stand for anything else in your heart?"

The girl did not even glance at me again. She was making swift little dots and dashes in the aforementioned note-book. But her voice—just a bit preoccupied—answered.

"I'm afraid that there's nothing else in my heart," she said. "I'm not much of a sentimentalist, you know. Holidays are just holidays to me—and nothing more. I'm," she turned hurriedly toward her typewriter, "I'm ever so sorry to disappoint you!"

IT WAS to the man of affairs that I next spoke. He is a professional man—swamped in matters of state and politics. He is also a rich man; so rich that folk say he counts his millions by the tens.

"When Thanksgiving Day comes around," I ventured a trifle shyly, "what do you think of? What are your reactions?"

"Thanksgiving?" he queried, "Bless my soul—it's almost here, isn't it? I must send for tickets to THE football game! I always go to THE football game. And I must remind my secretary to make out a check for the Mission, and for the newsboys' dinner—I think that every one should obey some charitable impulse on Thanksgiving Day. Don't you? And I must order my own dinner at Delmonico's—I always give a party to my closest associates—a man who is in politics must make use of every little occasion."

"Then," I asked, bluntly, my shyness forgotten, "then Thanksgiving is only a little occasion to you? To be made use of—in a political and social way?"

The man of affairs looked at me rather blankly.

"Of course one should make use of everything that can be used," he said. And then—"But I do send money, you know—quite a lot of money, to the poor. You heard me mention a check for the Mission and for the newsboys' dinner, didn't you? My secretary takes care of all that!"

I wanted to say something—something about an impersonal sort of charity. But I didn't. Doubtless GIVE us, dear God, true hearts that pray.

In thanks to You upon this day;

Give us brave souls that understand;

Give us kind eyes, a friendly hand,

A bit of love, a snatch of song—

To help earth's tired ones along!

God, let our feast, today, be spread
With food of tenderness, and bread
Of faith . . . And let our glasses flow
With pity. Let our table glow
With fellowship, and gentle fun,
And let us bow our heads as one.

Dear God, upon this day of days,
We bring to You our humble praise;
And ask that You may point the road,
That leads, at last, to Your abode.
Grant us ideals, and splendid goals;
Grant us true hearts and patient souls!

many poor people benefit by the man's generosity. It is he who misses the great thing—the greatest thing! For how can he know anything about the joy of giving?

A SMALL boy, a business girl, and a man of affairs! I had talked with all of them, and had been disappointed in each one. Of the three I think that the small boy had come nearest to appreciating the day. And so with a feeling of desperation, almost, I went to call on the lady that people call the Friendly Lady. They call her the Friendly Lady because, though she lives alone, her doors are always hospitably wide. And because her slim hands are always stretched out to help the needy. And because her lips are always smiling and her eyes are always full of understanding and, if need be, of tenderness and pity.

To the Friendly Lady I went. And I found her, quite marvelously, alone—for she is seldom alone.

"Always at this time of year," she said softly, "I get to thinking of how much I have to be thankful for, and of—"

I interrupted.

"And of what Thanksgiving really means!" I said. The Friendly Lady smiled gently.

"And of what Thanksgiving really means," she repeated after me; "of the spirit that lies behind the day. I get to thinking of the real things of life—the real blessings. I get to thinking of our Pilgrim ancestors and of the goodly heritage that they left us."

"The goodly heritage?" I questioned.

"Yes, the goodly heritage," answered the friendly Lady, "the heritage of home—and of all that home stands for. Of the homes that they fought to make, and that they thanked God for."

"We, today, are getting very far away from the Thanksgiving ideals of home and of home-making. We are getting too sophisticated—as a people—to bow down and give thanks for the bread and the meat that the Pilgrim fathers—by their bravery—have made possible for us. We are becoming absorbed with the thought that Thanksgiving is a day to be given over to amusement and over-eating!"

"Thanksgiving is really God's gift to the people of America. The Pilgrims recognized it as such and the President of the United States usually says something of the sort in his Proclamation—which very few of us ever trouble to read. It is a day when every hand should be stretched out in bounty—when every heart should be raised to the Father on high. It is a day of harvests—mental and spiritual and moral. It is a day of feasts—and the feasts should be composed, in part, of things other than turkey and mince-pie. The feasts should be feasts of love and righteousness!"

Peter and the Angels

"WHERE'S Dad?"

Peter stood at the door of the kitchen, his feet planted far apart, his hands thrust against his hips where vainly he searched for the pockets owned by bigger boys.

Peter's mother looked out of the window, instead of at him, until he repeated his question in a voice made shrill by impatience. Then she turned.

"I've told you so many times, Peterkin. He's fighting dragons."

"Big dragons?" persisted Peter.

"Monsters," she said.

For a minute he digested this, and then: "Does he have to fight 'em all the time, every single minute of the time? Can't he leave 'em for a minute and come and see me?"

His mother shook her head. "If you leave dragons for a minute, they'll leap on your back and down you."

Never before had Peter's eyes failed to fill with interest at dragon details, but now his eyes were cloudy, his mouth drooped in dissatisfied lines.

"What's the good of having a Dad if I can't see him?"

Into the eyes of Peter's mother crept a look of sorrow, seldom allowed ascendancy in his presence. Before she could answer he turned sulkily away.

"I don't believe I've got a Dad!" The bitter doubt was flung across his shoulder. "Tony Ragelli said I didn't, and Katie Smithers said 'course I didn't if I'd never seen him, and Tad Winters said 'fore they'd believe it I'd got to show him to 'em."

It was out, all the torment of his soul. His initiation into school life had been a trying time. First, the taunt flung at his hair. Bonnie, his mother called it; but the youngsters called it red. Six battles had Peter fought because of it. The vanquished had then assailed him with a taunt that touched heart instead of temper. The question of Dad, or no Dad, was not one to be settled by fists. He had brought it home and flung it at his mother.

SHE pushed her work from her, raced after him, caught him on the steps of the dingy tenement. For the first time in his life, Peter shook her hand from his shoulder, but she swept him into her arms, carried him into the house and into the tiny bedroom.

"Peter!" Even his young heart recognized the solemnity of her voice. He ceased to struggle, and listened. "Dear, if you open your heart to Doubt, he'll crowd out Faith; and only Faith brings happiness. Doubt is harder to fight even than dragons. Repeat after me now, 'I believe in Dad.'"

Just one tear splashed down on Peter's little red head. He felt it and was made uncomfortable. His lips quivered, but Doubt already had one foot across the threshold of his heart.

"Did you ever see him?"

A smile glistened where tears had been. "Oh, yes, I've seen him, dear." Like one chanting a hymn of faith she added: "And I shall see him again. Some time he'll come to us."

Peter let pass unheeded the prophecy, heard so many times. He was out now for facts.

"What does he look like?" he demanded.

For answer she walked with him to the glass over the bureau.

"See those eyes?" She pointed to Peter's own. Big eyes they were, whose grayness deepened in certain lights to a tinge of greenish brown. Peter saw them, but what of that?

"They're just like Dad's." She hugged him so closely he squealed, and she eased her clasp a little. "You're just like Dad all over, every bit of you. This forehead; this beautifully straight nose, and this chin that can stand for both obstinacy and strength. Even this cleft in your chin."

Peter stared into the big grave eyes, felt of the beautifully straight nose, and placed a rather grimy finger against the cleft in his chin.

The Story of a Boy's Faith

By ELIZABETH EMMETT

Illustrated by William C. McNulty

"Does he love you?" he probed, unaware of cruelty. Proudly the little woman flung back her head.

"Yes, he loves me, Peter."

"Then why are your eyes so cryey? And why doesn't he come and kiss the tears away?"

"He'll come when he can. Until then, have faith. It's nothing to believe in things you see and understand. That's not faith, Peter. And love without faith is a worthless love."

Peter began to feel ashamed, and looked it.

"I'll tell 'em so," he declared stoutly. "Next

Katie retreated to a safe distance; then called gloatingly:

"Oh, Peter, Peter, Pumpkin Eater, your Dad's in prison."

That's where he is."

Tad wouldn't look at Peter. He looked at Tony Ragelli instead, and Tony looked at him. Peter looked at both.

"Where is prison?" he asked.

Tad replied indefinitely: "Oh, way off there, somewhere."

"As far off as heaven?"

Tony stepped into the breach. "I'll show you if you want me to. 'Tain't so very far if you walk fast. I've been over there. But you can't git inside."

The bell rang before Peter could question more. He did his sums wrong and had to stay in recess. When school was over and he started out with Tony, they walked too fast to talk. He didn't care much about talking, now that he was going to see Dad.

But there were high walls all around the grounds, and two great high gates in front. Tony pointed to a big building, set in back of the iron fence.

"He's looked up in there," he said, "and he can't get out."

Peter listened. There were dragons there, he knew. Maybe they would roar. But all was quiet behind the iron gates.

Tony nudged him and they started home. Somewhere within his little body was a dreadfully big ache. If Dad couldn't get out, and he couldn't get in, there didn't seem any chance of seeing him ever.

He did not tell his mother of the visit. She would not like it, he felt. So he told her about the sums that wouldn't come right, and let her think he had been kept after school for them.

She was singing quite a lot lately. Peter liked to hear her sing, and as any mention of Dad brought a white look to her face and a trembling to her lips, he left her to her singing, and pretended to do examples while he pondered on a way to get Dad through those gates.

RATHER slowly he went when the time came for her to read his bed-time story. He brought the big Bible and turned the colored pictures listlessly.

"Do you love Jesus?" he asked suddenly.

"Yes, dear." Her answer was not perfunctory, but as sincere as if his question had been, "Do you love Dad?" And then she explained to him:

"When sorrow comes, we have to have some one to cling to; some one to comfort us when the heart cries out in the dark."

Peter threw his arms about her neck.

"There ain't nothing in the dark to frighten you, Muvver. I'm always there, you know."

For a minute they snuggled closely together. Then she turned to the big book again.

"What shall I read to you, Peter?"

"Something about angels," he said. And she turned to the story of Easter and the resurrection.

Peter interrupted once. "Was it a very big stone?" he asked, when she read that the angel of the Lord descended from heaven and came and rolled away the stone.

"So big one man couldn't move it," she answered.

Peter didn't listen to the rest. He was thinking. Those iron gates, he remembered, rested on two large stones. Perhaps if the angels would roll them away, Dad could open the gates and come out.

He went again to the prison, and again; but he went alone. For some reason he didn't want Tony or any one with him while he stood quietly before the big gates and watched for Dad. Often his feet ached with the cold, and his hands were blue. Only the big eyes glowed with warmth.

One of the officials began to notice him.

"Who are you?" he asked one day.

"I'm Peter; Dad's Peter. Do the angels ever come here?" he asked in turn.

"Dad's own boy," she crooned, as she began to divest him of his splendor. "We mustn't get a wrinkle in them until Sunday" time they say I haven't got no Dad I'll show 'em faith."

HE TOLD Tad Winters about it the next day. Tad sort of backed away without saying much. But Katie Smithers jeered.

"We know you've got a Dad now. We know all about him. Tad's sister told us."

Tad jerked her arm. "And she told you not to blab it," he scowled. "You just git out now or I'll punch your face."

The officer's tone grew very gentle. "Not very often, I'm afraid, Peter. Did you expect to find them here?"

Peter shivered a little in the March wind. "I only wanted 'em to roll those big stones away, so's Dad could get out."

The officer bent closer. He put a big hand under the cleft in Peter's chin and turned the face upward. "What is Dad's name?" he coaxed.

"Just Dad," said Peter, and turned his mournful eyes away to look again through the gates.

"He must have some other name."

Peter shook his head. "That's all my Muvver calls him—just Peter's Dad. But once I heard her crying in the night and saying way down soft, like she thought no one would hear, 'I want you so, my very dearest, I want you so.' But when I crept up close to her and asked her was she calling me, she said, 'No, Peter, dear, go to sleep.' Perhaps that's his name. Is there any one in there called My Very Dearest?"

The big man lifted Peter up and looked at every feature, nodded once or twice as though to confirm a growing belief, and set him on his feet again.

"They're known by numbers, instead of names, most of them in there, Peter, but I'll look around and if I find one who once was called My Very Dearest, I'll let you know. You tell me your whole name so I can get word to you."

Peter put his hands behind him, turned his toes out, and recited his full name and address, as his mother had taught him to do.

"I thought as much." Something seemed to please the man. His voice was gentle, but not nearly so pitying when he said good-by.

"Come again," he invited. "Perhaps—there, there, kiddie, run along. It's getting late."

PETER was uncomfortably aware of that fact all the way home. His talk with the officer had kept him many minutes longer than common. Muvver seldom scolded. Nearly always she was gentle, but when she said "Stand in the corner, Peter, for ten whole minutes," Peter's little heart sank to the toes of his stubbed-out shoes. Ten minutes was such a long time for a little boy to keep still in a corner, his face pressed against the wall.

He stubbed his toes more than common tonight. Somehow he didn't want to go home. More than ever, he wanted Dad. He guessed all boys, no matter how much they loved their mothers, wanted a Dad to chum with now and then.

Very softly he entered the house. Nobody was in the kitchen. He went into the bedroom. His mother lay upon the bed, a letter pressed against her cheek. Peter noticed that her eyes were mistily soft, but he hadn't time to notice more before he was caught up in her arms.

"Peter! Peter!" He pressed her lips to stop their trembling, and she kissed each finger, then clasped them in her own. "Peter, would you like to be spanked by Dad?"

Peter cuddled down beside her. His whole body quivered with ecstasy. To be spanked by Dad, instead of being stood in a corner by Muvver! Would he like it!

"Oh, you bet," he gurgled. "Can I be, Muvver? When can I be?"

"Perhaps—I don't know—just when, Peter—but maybe, soon."

Even then Peter dared not tell her of his visits to the prison. But he pondered all the evening. In the night, long after he was supposed to be asleep, he groped his way across the bed to her.

"Muvver." He whispered very softly, for if she were asleep he did not want to waken her. The readiness with which she gathered him into her arms showed him that she, too, was wakeful.

"Have you been talking with the angel, Muvver?" Even in the darkness he seemed to know that she was smiling as she whispered back:

"Oh, Peter, dear, I think I've talked with God."

IT RAINED the next two days and Peter could not go to the prison, but the third day he was there. The officer was there, also.

"Seen any angels yet?" asked Peter.

"Not yet, Peter, but—" he beckoned him closer and lowered his voice in a confidential way, "Last night I thought I heard a rustling."

Peter's eyes grew bigger. "Their wings," he volunteered. "I've heard 'em sometimes when Muvver turns the pictures in the Bible."

"I thought it might be that," agreed his friend.

Peter had another question.

"Did you find any one called My Very Dearest?"

"I didn't like to ask. Names like that are to be whispered soft-like; not tossed around in my rough voice." The dreary look crept back to Peter's eyes, and the other hastened on: "But I found one who said he was Peter's Dad."

"Honest?" The little hands clutched the irons of the gateway. "What does he look like?" Eyes and voice demanded proof.

The officer smiled, plucked the cap from the little red head. "Just like you, Peter, only some heavier. But you'll take on left in time, no doubt; and then you'll look just like him."

"Are his eyes like mine?"

"As like as four peas."

"Is his nose straight?"

"Your own is no straighter."

Peter gulped down a great sigh of satisfaction.

"That's him," he said. "Eyes were shining now."

"Could he spank me, do you think?"

"Easy as could be. Like to be spanked, kiddie?"

Peter hung his head. "I've never been," he confessed. Then a sudden passion seized him. He kicked his stubby shoes at the gate, banged his fists upon the stones. "Things'd be different if I could get Dad out," he stormed.

The kindly laughter was hushed in the big man's throat. His voice sounded almost gruff as he pried the little fingers from the bars and turned Peter about.

"Run home now, kiddie. You don't want to get to cussing when maybe there's angels round. If it wasn't for maybe disappointing you, I'd tell—there, there, run along home. And if I was you I'd sort of talk to the angels. Maybe they can do something."

"Muvver talks to God," said Peter, "and He can't seem to get Dad out." Then he started home.

THERE were new shoes awaiting him, and a little gray suit.

"Hurry, Peter, and try them on," urged his mother. Peter noticed that her face had the same shining look it wore the night she had pressed the letter close. Her eyes, too, were misty; a soft mist that somehow looked like gladness.

"You've been talking with God again," he challenged.

She caught up the little gray suit and the shining new shoes and laughed her way into the bedroom.

"Peterkin, Peterkin, kick off those stubby shoes," she commanded.

In less than ten minutes he stood before the glass and studied the new Peter produced by the gray suit. He wasn't sure he liked himself as well as in the worn and patched knickers he had just kicked off. But his mother covered him with kisses.

"Dad's own boy," she crooned, as she began to divest him of his splendor. "We mustn't get a wrinkle in them until Sunday," she explained to his unspoken question. "Sunday is Easter, did you know it, Laddie?"

Peter hadn't known it. A wondrous light dawned in his eyes. "That's the day the angels rolled the big stone away, isn't it?"

His mother nodded. A light, like the light in Peter's eyes, shone in her own. "The day of resurrection from the dead," she whispered softly. "The beginning of a new life."

High Hopes for Arms Conference

WASHINGTON now is the focal point of the world's interest, for there the leading statesmen of the world are beginning the deliberations which will affect directly for better or for worse the peoples of every land. What a happy result if the Conference on Limitation of Armament and on Pacific and Far Eastern Questions—the most notable gathering of statesmen and diplomatists ever held in the New World and one which it is hoped will go down in history as the beginning of a new and better era in international relationships—is able to lighten definitely the burden of maintaining great armies and navies which has strained the backs of the citizens of all civilized nations! What a disastrous blow to the cause of international conciliation if the sessions end without real accomplishment!

As the Conference begins the men who are to be the leading figures in its momentous discussions are expressing confidence that it will be a success. If the delegates bring with them from abroad anything of mutual distrust and jealousy, that fact is carefully concealed. Never did a great international conference begin in such a spirit of willingness to seek the common good, in such optimistic determination to consult together with open minds to do everything possible to minimize the possibilities for war.

This spirit was admirably expressed by Senator Carlo Schanzer, the president of the Italian delegation, in giving the pledge on his arrival in Washington that Italy would "never hesitate to give all her support to any proposal which may eliminate future conflicts and assure peace."

"We feel convinced," he added, "that the Conference will reach a substantial conclusion and that the friendly relationship between the United States and Italy will be consecrated by even closer links of friendship."

"Italy is anticipating with the greatest interest the work of the Conference and wishes that its great finality may be fulfilled, assuring the world of the maintenance of peace and the reduction of armaments. Only thus will it be possible to reduce the heavy burden which oppresses the budgets of every country."

"Peace is for Italy the supreme ideal; not only peace with her neighbors, but also the general peace of the world."

"Of course, Italy has the duty of safeguarding her national interests and her security, but this does not prevent her from being opposed to any new war. When we remember that the economic system of the world must form one block we understand that any war today represents an economic disaster, not only for the countries which are called to fight, but also for every other country. War means destruction of wealth, paralyzation of industry, and interruption of international trade."

A LIKE pledge was given in Washington by Prince Iyesato Tokuwaga, president of the Japanese House of Peers and one of the three principal Japanese delegates to the Conference: "We hope that the Conference will turn out to be very successful," he declared, "and all of our delegates wish and are determined that we shall do our very best not only for our own country but also for the peace of the world."

And Arthur J. Balfour, who will head the British delegation until such time as Premier Lloyd George is able to adjust domestic affairs so as to permit his coming to Washington, declared, as he started for America: "I am going with earnest hopes, with confident hopes."

IN NEXT week's issue of the Christian Herald, Dr. Charles M. Sheldon will present the first of a series of articles on the proceedings of the Conference, written from Washington and containing his analysis of the composition of the Conference and the prospects of accomplishing the work for which it was called together. Dr. Sheldon's intimate contact with all the important movements in recent years looking toward international peace and his extended acquaintanceship among statesmen of all the countries represented will make these articles of very high value.

A day or so earlier, in speaking before the Pilgrims' Society in London, Mr. Balfour had said that if the delegates met in the belief that the world could be made enormously better but not expecting that every evil could be removed by the stroke of a wand, and determined firmly not to separate without having done something great for mankind, he was sure they would be able eventually to congratulate themselves that the efforts started by President Harding would be brought to a happy and fruitful conclusion. No conference, he said, ever met under better auspices.

On the same occasion a message from Premier Lloyd George told of his keen desire to attend the Washington Conference and added this assurance: "For summoning it, the world owes President Harding a debt of sincerest gratitude, and we shall do our utmost to insure its success."

PREMIER BRIAND, before starting from France as the chief of that nation's spokesmen, declared that France was going to Washington in the interests of world peace. In Europe, he asserted, she was making great efforts for peace by the exercise of her patience, and in the United States she wished to make efforts of the same kind to insure that the peace of the whole world should be kept. He outlined the two great questions involved in the Conference as those of equilibrium in the Pacific and of disarmament, and declared France would not take a combative position but, going among friends, would seek to clear away differences.

Public opinion in France was less optimistic regarding the success of the efforts to reduce armament, particularly on land, than was public opinion in other countries, but no people would rejoice more keenly than those of France to see some arrangement made which would permit the disbanding of armies without endangering national security.

The other governments participating in the Washington gathering—China, Holland, Belgium and Portugal—are earnestly desirous of a reduction of armaments, but in that phase of the discussion they are to have no part, since it is felt the chances for an agreement will be improved if only the five great powers participate. But in the discussion of Pacific and Far Eastern questions they may contribute to an adjustment of points of difference and thus help to clear the way for a final settlement which would make the Washington Conference the greatest boon to humanity.

The Dreamer

"WHAT is the crowd all about?" asked the Dreamer as he stood on the edge of an enormous crush in the big city.

The Old-Timer looked at him in pity.

"Don't you know this is a military parade, and we are turning out to honor the Heroes of War?"

"Oh," said the Dreamer, "I see. But I thought we were going to discuss world-wide peace, and universal disarmament. Why at this particular time is War being glorified?"

"You are mistaken," chipped in the Man-About-Town. "The crowd is not glorifying war. It is only honoring those who fought and won."

"But I wonder," said the Dreamer, "if it is true yet, after all the years of War's horrors, that what we call militarism is, after all, a powerful thing with the multitude, and entices it and charms it, in spite of the agony and wrong of it."

"It does look like it, doesn't it?" said the Minister. "I wonder sometimes, with the Dreamer, what the crowd would do if Jesus came to the city. Would it decorate the streets in His honor and turn out in such a mass as this?"

"Of course, it would not," said Old Man Ultimate Consumer. "Because in the first place, Jesus would not permit any such display in His honor."

"And yet militarism, as the world has always known it, is somehow alluring to the mob. Its trappings, its glory, its pomp and style rouse the imagination," said the Old-Timer. "And it will always be so."

"Let us fervently hope not," said the Dreamer. "Let us hope the time may soon come when the crowd will turn out as great as this to honor Literature, or Science, or Art, or Music, or Labor, or Religion."

"It is an empty dream," said the Man-About-Town. "It will never come to pass."

"I don't know about that," said the Dreamer, speaking stoutly. "There are signs of a change against War and Militarism on the part of the masses."

"Yes, like what we see here today," said Old Man Ultimate Consumer, with a sneer.

"In spite of all we see," said the Dreamer, as he turned and went away, his face uplifted to the sky and his lips trembling in prayer.

Wanted—A Joshua!

THAT was a memorable day on which Joshua gathered the tribes of Israel at Shechem, and sought by his plain and sturdy eloquence to wean them away from strange gods and evil ways. He recounted the wonderful deliverances God had wrought for them as a nation, and how He had finally brought them into a fruitful land, as He had promised, although they had not proved deserving. They had adopted the vices and the heathen worship of the alien races, and now they had come to the parting of the ways. They must decide as a nation for righteousness or sin. "Choose you this day whom ye will serve," was Joshua's summons, "the gods of your fathers who fell into idolatry and suffered for their wickedness, or the true God! . . . But as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord!" With united voice they pledged obedience and a solemn covenant was made.

Our land today needs a Joshua to lead our people back to God. In a very remarkable address at the recent World Conference on Christian Fundamentals, held in Denver, Colo., Dr. Don O. Sheldon, president of the National Bible Institute, reviewing the drift of modern civilization, showed how this nation, in every step of whose early beginnings the leadings of a gracious providence were discernible, had within a single generation drifted far away from its moorings. He charged that we have come a luxury-loving people, indifferent to the Church and its spiritual teachings. Among the marks of this decadence are the prevalence of crimes of violence and dishonesty, the increase of suicide and the prevalence of divorce. Impiety and impurity, he declared, are conspicuous in our great cities. Even the high standards of business have deteriorated, while the Lord's Day is given over to pleasure and feasting, and Jesus and His Gospel are largely ignored.

If such an indictment were true in so overwhelming a degree as the speaker implied, then we would be coming perilously near to the condition of those nations of the past of whom it was written that they had "forgotten God." That it is fortunately true only in part, any one watchful of the spirit of the times will concede.

But it is a gross error to conclude that because the Gospel battle-line may have its vulnerable spots, therefore the whole front is in danger. We believe that never were conditions more hopeful for the Church's fidelity and ability to perform its great mission, than today. We have witnessed its war against intemperance; its splendid charities; its ever-widening efforts in the mission field at home and abroad; and the faithfulness of its leaders, who are striving with might and main to spread the message of salvation everywhere.

To lose courage and confidence now, would be folly and wickedness. He who sees the hearts of men will give a full harvest to his faithful workers. Not to spread discouragement and dismay, but rather to energize and strengthen in every way possible the Church in its work, should be the mission of all true men who have the nation's spiritual welfare at heart. Like Joshua, they will find success along the lines of hope and encouragement.

Possible, Think?

SUPPOSE the railroad strike had been fully carried out and the railroad workers to a man had stopped all work.

Suppose there had been no break among the different railroad unions, and literally the roads had been deserted by every engineer, fireman, signal man, dispatcher, telegrapher, shopman, freight handler, switchman, trainman and helper.

Even under that condition it would not have been such a national disaster as some would have us believe.

There are thousands of able men in this country who could learn to handle a locomotive with six months' experience. The common use of machinery in the last ten years by thousands of men who are driving high-power automobiles has given to the country a habit of using mechanical power. And as a matter of fact, it requires more skill, and often more courage, to guide an automobile through the streets of a crowded city like New York and Chicago, than it does to run an express train over a track all permanently laid between New York and Chicago. There is really more danger of accident and loss of life in driving down Broadway or State Street with an automobile than in driving an express engine on a track protected by signals and a block system and sent on its way by a train dispatcher who looks after the safety of the entire train while the engineer directs the steam and the air-brakes and runs by order.

The old rule of the locomotive engineer's apprenticeship used to be six years' firing before sitting on the engineer's seat.

There are plenty of men now who could master the use of an engine in six months.

And for that matter, all other railroad work could be learned with far greater rapidity than was true ten years ago.

Not Discussed

IT IS quite certain that at the Conference in Washington, a large number of topics will be taken up and discussed.

Among these will be the situation in the Pacific, the relations of China to Japan, of the forces in India and Egypt to Great Britain, the preponderance of military need on the part of France, owing to her fear of Germany, and a great number of questions concerning the limitation of what will be defended as absolutely necessary defenses.

All this, every one who is watching the discussion, will allow will be a part of the program outlined by the different nations.

The one thing that will not be discussed, in all probability, will be the one thing that would do more to bring practical results than anything else.

That one thing is the spirit of mutual good-will between the nations.

The Diplomat at this point will sneer and take up his hat and go out.

The Politician at this point will shrug his shoulders and light a cigar.

The Militarist will say: "Nonsense!"

The average second-rate statesman will say: "Impractical and visionary!"

The real statesman will give the thought a place in his mind, but he will say finally that the thing is too ideal and that the delegates would not understand it and certainly would not spend the time discussing it.

And yet, will real war ever cease, and militarism ever perish until men's hearts are right towards one another? What keeps the great armaments going at the cost of bankruptcy for the world?

Is it not the spirit of fear and hate and suspicion and ill-will on the part of mankind?

Why should the one thing that will remove these passions be the one thing that will not be discussed at the Conference?

Is the human mind incapable of grasping a fundamental idea? Is it true that after 2,000 years of Jesus we are still so stupid mentally and morally that we will not use His statesmanship to bring peace?

Will the Conference discuss everything except the main thing?

We hope not.

"Bread Upon the Waters"

A BROOKLYN business man, with something of more than worldly philosophy, has just discovered how to make charity pay, and incidentally he has found a new idea in advertising. Every afternoon he gives away several hundred pennies to the children of the district in which he lives and does business. He deals in old iron, brass, pumps and stationary engines. He doesn't forget the babies either. The little folks of the neighborhood have designated his gifts as the "pay-off"—and if even an infant in arms appears at the window, it is sure of a penny or two at least.

This odd way of doing business, which many are disposed to laugh at, is reckoned by the principal person interested to be a "good investment." Years ago, as he explains, there was a good deal of petty thieving around his old business place; but now every child is as watchful of its benefactor's interest as a paid detective. They are like an invisible police, constantly on the alert to save their patron from loss. In a single theft some years ago, 400 pounds of brass were stolen; but nobody could take a brush or a tool from his establishment, and get away with it now. His generosity has accomplished two things: it has made the children understand what they never knew before, about the value of honesty; and it has let the business man know that there are ways in which money may be spent, without splurge or ostentation, and yet give a good return.

Why Grow Old?

ONE of the most painful sights in this good old world is the sight of a disagreeable Old Man.

Next to that is a disagreeable Old Woman. If one is going to grow old, why not choose a good way to do it?

Instead of being a grouch, why not make up your mind to be a smiler? Instead of being disagreeable, why not increase the list of your friends by your good nature and good company?

Instead of being a pessimist, who, as a friend of the editor said, will not use a life-preserver thrown to him because it has a hole in it, be an optimist and believe the world is not all going to the bow-wows just because there is one dog in the block who occasionally disturbs your slumbers?

There are certain things men and women can do to keep from growing old disagreeably. Here they are:

Do something outside your regular business.

Play with young folks and love little children.

Eat less and exercise more.

Teach a class of boys in a Sunday school and pitch horseshoes with your neighbor next day.

Learn to cook a good meal so as to help out when the hired girl leaves.

Keep up with good reading, and keep interested in the real news of the world.

Stand by good causes and believe in the ultimate triumph of God.

Pray every morning to be kept from being disagreeable and thank God at night that you are not yet in a hospital or a jail.

Say "Good morning!" in your happiest tones to the family when you get up and don't be afraid to thank God for your breakfast.

There are a good many other ways to avoid a disagreeable old age. We can not help the unavoidable increase of added years. We can avoid making those years painful and burdensome to ourselves and others.

TO THE long list of public men who have fallen at the hands of assassins has been added the name of Premier Hara of Japan, a statesman whose rise from humble rank to a dominating position in the Japanese government must have inspired every true advocate of democracy in Japan with new hope.

Estimates of Federal Expenditures for Year Are Cut to $3,940,000,000

The Senate has been at work on the new revenue measure and has made many changes in the bill as passed by the House. With all committee amendments to the bill disposed of, it was counted on to yield a revenue of $3,250,000,000. The Smoot manufacturers' and producers' sales tax amendment, over which there had been much controversy, was rejected by a vote of 43 to 25; but Senate leaders indicated that this proposal, calculated to produce $253,000,000, might be adopted later to provide a bonus for veterans of the World War.

Crowning the Year

A Thanksgiving Sermon

By DR. CHARLES M. SHELDON

TEXT—Psa. 150:6. "Let every thing that hath breath praise the Lord."

NOW it came to pass that on a certain day the Minister went forth into his parish among his people to find out, if possible, how many of them had a spirit of ingratitude, and also how many were ready and eager to give thanks for something which made life worth having.

And as he met one and another of his people he put to each one, regardless of rank or condition, this question:

"The Psalmist saith, 'Let every thing that hath breath praise the Lord.' That sentence includes all living creatures. As one of God's children, what reason have you to praise the Lord? For what are you thankful in this year of the Lord, nineteen hundred and twenty-one?"

If, as occasionally happened, the one questioned replied that he was not thankful for anything, the Minister did not record his answer, as he was not seeking material for a "Thankless" sermon, but for a "Thanksgiving" one. But to his pleasure, and also some what, perhaps, to his surprise, nearly all the people in his parish were grateful for some special thing, and these the Minister noted, as he passed along, to weave them into the fabric of his discourse for Thanksgiving Day. And here, as he recorded them, are the answers he received, and a brief note describing each one who made answer to the Minister's direct inquiry.

FROM a Teacher, employed in one of the city grades:

"I am thankful because in my school I see, daily, boys and girls of several different nationalities growing into good Americans. Their parents have, in many cases, been of a lawless, or dangerous character. But these children do not know nor care for the old countries where father and mother were born. They will, in time, come to love and respect this country and our flag. I have in my school, Bohemians, Italians, Hungarians, Austrians, Greeks and Germans. And as I watch their growing interest in this country, and as I have the rare privilege of training and shaping their thought and conduct, I can not help being thankful to the Lord that I have been called into this great position as a teacher.

"I do not receive a very large salary. My name does not appear in the society columns of the Sunday paper. But there is a very deep and true satisfaction every day of my life in the thought that by means of the public school of this country I am privileged to shape the characters of those who are to help make, as I believe, a better and happier United States than we now have. Truly, I feel like saying, for myself, 'Praise the Lord!'"

FROM a Tired Housekeeper:

"It is true that when night comes I am, generally, a very tired woman. It is impossible for us to secure good help in the kitchen or for the work of the house, and the burden of it falls on me. There are little children to clothe and feed and watch over. There are three meals a day to prepare and all the varied and continuous work necessary to keep a home neat, attractive and economical. And there are times when I confess I feel like complaining that I am so narrowly shut up to this routine and drudgery.

"But when I stop to think of what a home really means to the value of a nation, and what would happen to my husband and children if I selfishly neglected my home duties, then I feel like saying with a full heart, 'Praise the Lord!' I am indeed thankful that I am a mother, that my husband and children love me, and I know that none of my toil is wasted or useless, for it is being done to maintain an enduring institution, a Home. I am thankful to be a Homemaker, not a mere Housekeeper, 'Praise the Lord!'"

FROM a Retired Minister, a member of the Pastor's parish:

"I am, outwardly, a useless old man. My work in the Church, of which I was for many years pastor, is over. I am living as a pensioner on the small allowance which my denomination apportioned me. My wife is living, but she is very feeble. Our two children died in early years of scarlet fever. Nearly all our companions and friends are dead or living in other places, and we are very lonesome, my dear wife and I, as we live in two small rented rooms, with almost no callers and very little human friendship from younger church members.

"And yet, we are very thankful for God's mercy and for the power of the Cross and for the future of the Church which we love above all earthly things. We have fought our fight. We hope we have kept the faith. We are waiting for the summons to come Home. But as long as we wait here in the flesh, we will praise the Lord for His goodness, for our share in His triumphs, and for everlasting life. 'Praise the Lord!'"

FROM a College Boy, working his way through school:

"I am very thankful that I am well enough to work to get an education. I don't have much time for dances and social functions, and I am really not able to stand the expense, and sometimes I get pretty blue thinking it over. But on the whole, I am happy in the main thing, for no matter what else I miss of college life, I am at least getting what I came for, and after all, I have no cause to whine.

"Really I can say in reply to your question, I am thankful that I am able to earn a large part of my college expenses as I go along. I have an idea that some time, if I ever have a son of my own, I will rather For I have learned on this bed of pain lessons I never learned when I was well. 'Praise the Lord!'"

FROM a very Old Woman, who has been a chronic sufferer from muscular rheumatism for over twenty years:

"Yes, I know how I look, all bent over, as I sit here in this chair to which, I have been confined for almost a quarter of a century. I can't shake hands because my fingers have turned backward at the joints. Look! Like claws of some ugly bird, only worse. And my head is twisted on my neck and my back is crooked, and I can't control my lip muscles.

"Yes, my children are all gone and I am an inmate of this Old Ladies' Home where the kindness of our Church sent me. And I am all alone in the world, without a relative that I know.

"But my heart is full of thanksgiving. And in reply to your question, the reason for it is my faith in the goodness of my heavenly Father and my belief that some time I shall be living in that other world free from rheumatism and disfigurement and pain.

"Won't it be wonderful when I am as beautiful as an angel! It makes me laugh out loud at times, when I imagine it. People here think I'm a little off. But I know it is only my joy that I am anticipating. Oh, I have a great deal to be thankful for! 'Praise the Lord!'"

Our Sunday Service at Home

The Christian Herald Sermon is now read in many Homes as a Sunday Evening Service, a simple form of conducting which is outlined below. Neighbors should be cordially invited

Order of Service

Opening Hymn—"Blest Be the Tie that Binds," or "O Day of Rest and Gladness."

Invocation—"The Lord's Prayer"—all join.

Scripture Reading—Thanksgiving for Blessings.—Psalm 65: verses 9 to 13. Also Psalm 66: verses 16 to 20.

Dr. Jowett's Sunday Meditation—(See page 847, first column.)

Sermon—"CROWNING THE YEAR"—To be read aloud by the head of the household or his substitute.

Requests for Prayer—These may be offered by any of those present who feel led to do so. The requests may be forwarded to Pastor Sheldon, in New York for submission to the Prayer League.

Closing Hymn—"My Jesus, I Love Thee," or "Bringing in the Sheaves."

Benediction—By Pastor Charles M. Sheldon, to be read aloud:

O Light of the world, lighten my world! Redeemer of all the people, may I call Thee mine! So when Thy hands of blessing are held out over the multitude, may I feel their healing power laid on my heart, that with Thy blessing given me, I may share it with the whole wide world. AMEN.

brag to him about the way his Dad did it. Because I notice most of the fellows in my class are being supported by their father's money. I am rather proud of my own earnings. 'Praise the Lord!'"

FROM a Business Man, suddenly sent to the hospital where he has been an inmate for several weeks after a serious operation:

"I have never been seriously sick before, in all my life, and this is a new experience for me. At first I could not understand it and I refused to be reconciled to it. My business seemed very important. It has been very much neglected while I have been here, owing to incompetent clerks and an ignorant partner. My operation has cost me a thousand dollars and my hospital expenses will be several hundred. But as I have been lying here, suffering great pain most of the time and worrying, I regret to say, over my business, to the extent of retarding my recovery, I have gradually come to feel ashamed of myself when I call to mind the many kindnesses of God.

"My wife and family have been heroic helpers during this experience. The Church has sent me flowers and messages of good cheer. Through the wonderful skill of the surgeon and the faithful care of the nurses, I am alive and will recover. Thanks be to God for His goodness. I still have the best things of life, even if my business has suffered seriously.

FROM the Richest Man in the parish:

"A great many people in our Church envy me for my wealth. And some, I am quite sure, dislike me for it. But many others think that if they were as rich as I am they would be very happy and contented.

"But as a matter of fact, at this Thanksgiving season, it is not the amount of money I own that gives me the most gratitude. I don't mind saying that I enjoy the power money gives a man, and I am just beginning to understand the joy that comes from giving money to good causes. But when it comes to expressing my thanks to God for something, I certainly would not dare to say, 'Praise the Lord! I am the Richest Man in this parish!' That would be blasphemy. What I would like to say is that I am thankful for all the things my riches can not buy—the love of my wife and children, the friendship of a few men who are my friends for other reasons, and the confidence that my business associates have in me. I know perfectly well that if I should lose my human friendships, all the money in the world could not purchase happiness for me.

"So I am ready to say, 'Thanks be to God for the things even my large wealth can not buy. Respect, confidence, friendship, yes, the home love which I do have, are my real reasons for thanksgiving. 'Praise the Lord!'"

FROM a Negro whose work is connected with the digging out of the sewer manholes of the city sewer system:

"Yes, sir, it does look like a dirty mean job. And you're right. It haint no flower garden. No, sir. But I'm happy. I haint grumbling. I'm well, and I got an appetite and I earn the money to feed the appetite; yes, sir.

"What am I thankful for? Well, sir, I heard you yourself say once that if all the men that do my work of cleaning out the city sewers and flushing the manholes was to quit, and no one else would do it, the whole city would go to rack and ruin, and sickness and death would visit all the homes.

"Ever since I heard that, I say to myself every time I lowers myself into this manhole to clean it out: 'I'm the biggest man in this here town, I am. The Mayor haint in it with me. I run this city, I do, not the big men on the avenue. I keep 'em all from pestilence and death, I do!' So that's the reason I'm thankful, sir. I'm such an important individual! The city could get along without a lot of folks. But it can't get on without me! No, sir! 'Praise the Lord!'"

FROM a Young Man dying of cancer:

"At first I thought I should go mad when the doctor told me. And I know there's no hope for me. It's too far along. And I did want to live.

"But I have had a vision of God's mercy and I am thankful for eternal life. And then, I never told you, but I have not lived a clean life, no. But Christ has forgiven me, and I am happy in all that. 'Praise the Lord!'"

The Home Field

SUNDAY. Luke 8:39. "Return to thine house, and show how great things God hath done unto thee." There is no wonder that this man longed to follow his Lord and to be one of his body-guard wherever He went. The Lord had just delivered him from a dreadful bondage. His life had been in foul possession. It had not been his own. He had moved under an inward and devilish constraint. He was the poor slave of an invisible tyrant, and it was as though a mysterious sort of hypnosis pervaded every faculty and limb in body and soul. "And oftentimes it had caught him; . . . and he was kept bound with chains and in fetters." And the Lord Jesus came his way, and He entered into that disorderly life and commanded peace. He entered that den of beastliness, and by the word of His power He brought purity and serenity and harmony. The poor distracted man was found "sitting at the feet of Jesus, clothed, and in his right mind." The quiet sentence affects one like a serene and beautiful evening after a stormy day. It is like "some sweet summer's morning after a night of pain."

No wonder he wanted to go with Christ wherever Christ went! What could be more fitting and more likely? Yet, with all the grace and graces of simple love, the Lord discountenanced it. "Return to thine own house!" He was bidden to go quietly home and tell his folk what had happened, and to witness that the great happening was the doing of the Lord. No foreign field for him! The home field! And a very quiet bit of the home field! He was turned away from the publicity that he coveted, and sent to serve in obscurity.

I think it very frequently happens, when men and women have been redeemed by Christ, that they are filled with a strong and even passionate desire to enter some prominent sphere of service. It is not that they are proud and lifted up, and therefore seek exalted places. They are of quite lowly disposition, but their passionate-gratitude drives them to seek some public ministry in the field of the Kingdom. And so they turn to the pulpit. Or they look towards the missionary's calling. Or, if it be not so far away, it may be a piece of public work at the other end of the town in which they live. And God says, "No, nearer, still! Not even at the other end of the town! Go back home! Go back to your own kindred! Go back to your own little circle of friends, and be My witness! Go back to your own workshop or office, and tell your mates what great thing the Lord hath done for you!"

I remember that one of Spurgeon's congregation went into his vestry after service, and asked to be allowed to join in Christian work. "What are you?" said Spurgeon. "I am an engine-driver." "Is the stoker converted?" "No." "My dear fellow, that is your piece of work!" His main opportunity was on the engine platform where he earned his daily bread.

It is not that the home work is the easier. There are some kinds of home work which are far more difficult than any which can be found in foreign lands. To speak to one's brother about Christ—is that easy? Or to one's friend? Or to one's work-mates? When we set about that sort of service we have to break through all manner of reluctances, and reticences, and conventions; they just bristle around us; and that kind of warfare is for men of violence who will take the Kingdom by storm.

And so these homely places are the homes of glorious service. Indeed, some of the greatest missionaries have never left home, and their names are high in the honor roll of the warriors of the Lord. Yes, I do not forget the two lines of our familiar hymn—

"Thou hast thy young men at the war, Thy little ones at home."

But all the same, I have known some mighty fine giants at home!

The Real Strength

MONDAY. Haggai 2:4. "Be strong, all ye people, saith the Lord, and work, for I am with thee." The prophet's main exhortation was, that the people again undertake the building of the Temple, already commenced but abandoned, owing to opposition. He did not urge his hearers to be swift as a cure for their delay; or hopeful, as a cure for their depression; or happy, to tune up their energies; or courageous, to meet their enemies; or energetic, to perform their tasks; but to "be strong," for strength is the basis and inclusion of all the rest.

His earnest words were heeded and the temple was pushed on to completion. The strength needed by the church today is not so much the strength of money, nor of influence, nor of talent, nor of numbers, nor even equipment. The real strength which should be earnestly sought is power untold, and two-fold; the power of spiritual resistance, and the power of spiritual achievement. We should count the cost when we take up the Christian life. If we have carefully thought out all it involves, and have deliberately taken our stand, we are not likely to lose our bearings whichever way the winds may blow. Thrown suddenly into companionship with those who are unworthy, brought face to face with some question of honor, we are not likely to lose our steadfastness if we deliberately choose the right. And our life usefulness is just as strong and active as it is ready to meet these temptations—"strong in the Lord." Good intentions are not stable enough to be depended on. Make sure that you really believe in the high ideals you cherish, and that they are the highest attainable, and then stand like a rock!

How can such strength be found and kept? Only through Christ. Pray earnestly and even in weakness thou shalt be made strong and—"As thy day, so thy strength shall be."

"Make us strong, O Lord, that we,
Helpful, true and kind may be;
Every day a kindly deed,
By the Master's spirit led;
Some one helped along life's way—
Strong for this, O Lord we pray!"

To Whom Shall We Go?

TUESDAY. John 6:68. "Thou only hast the words of eternal life." Tell me, where else I could go to find such gladness as I find in Him? The mis-lived past is blotted out; the future is all bright before me.

"I heard the voice of Jesus say,
Behold I freely give
The living water, thirsty one,
Stoop down and drink and live!"

I came to Jesus, and I drank
Of that life-giving stream;
My thirst was quenched, my soul revived,
And now I live in Him."

I live in Him! He is my treasure-trove. Take His love out of my life, and you leave me in a sunless world. Sun, moon and stars have all gone out! No Gospel, no manger, no Cross, no open sepulchre, no Golden Rule, no sacerdotal prayer, no vision of the Father's house, no knitting severed friendships, nothing to make life worth living here and no hope of a happy life further on!

Ah, no; blessed Lord and Master, we will not go away from Thee. To whom could we go? Thou only hast the words of eternal life.

What Is a Saint?

WEDNESDAY. Rom. 1:7. "Called to be saints." What is a saint? We all know how the world defines the term. In common use, only the perfect are entitled to it. Sometimes we apply the word in derision to those who make a pretense of piety. In common honesty, however, we owe it to ourselves to ascertain the Biblical meaning of the word.

Who are the saints in the Book? Many are imperfect. Not a few are sinful. But they all want to be better, they strive to be better; in order to achieve holiness they are willing to be separated from those who have no such aim. They are men and women who are conscious of a call to "leave their low-vaulted past." They obey that call, that voice, that vision. Some obey it more promptly and more constantly than others. But the consciousness of being called to higher things is the mark of the saint.

If this be true, is there one of us who cannot qualify? Are we not all saints who seek to follow Christ? To be sure, we are in various stages of perfection, but we are on the way! We are in the process of making. God's hand is on us for good, and Christ is not ashamed to call us brethren.

Let us remember whom Paul called saints. Wherever a soldier or a slave or a shop-keeper or a peasant or a poor man or a rich man or woman professed the Christian faith, Paul called that person a saint. There were saints in Caesar's household. There were saints in Corinth and in Ephesus. There were saints in Pergamos, "where Satan's seat was." There were Old Testament saints. There were saintly souls even among those who had never received the written revelation. God has not been without His witness in any day or among any people.

Possibly this, after all, is the best definition of the term saint—God's witness. And every one of us may be this by the help of "the Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world."

Growing in Grace

THURSDAY. 1 Pet. 3:18. "But grow in grace." Growth is the principle of nature in all realms, physical, intellectual, moral and spiritual. We grow by use and decay by disuse. The well man grows in health and stature; the sick declines. Of two seeds planted, only the one having the germ of life grows. The sun melts wax but hardens clay. Our attitude towards the Gardener of the soul is vital to development. We may attract the good, repelling the evil, or become more and more sensual like the Evil One.

First pure; then peaceable, gentle, merciful—all the flowers of the graces may adorn our lives. No marble mansion is more real than the building of noble character. Christ the Architect, the Master Builder, is also the Inhabitant, with us of the soul structure. He liveth in me, fashioning all into His likeness, for our life is hid with Christ in God, bound to His throne by the golden chain of faith, united with Him as the branches in the vine.

We lose our life for others in order to find it, for did not Stephen find his life in Paul, and Jesus in a world of sinners saved? Martyrs grow in grace rapidly when they surrender life for the truth as it is in Jesus.

Grace is divine favor, the joyful experience of the Christ-life in the soul, growing out of the animal into the spiritual. Grace develops into glory in the culmination of character. The Old Testament portrayed grace in pictures; the New Testament illustrated it in Him, Who, full of grace and truth, poured forth from His lips the living waters of life. Grace is mercy and truth kissing each other; God the Father and His children in loving embrace. E. W. C.

The Evangel Flame

FRIDAY. Acts 2:47. "And the Lord added to the church daily, such as should be saved." The text speaks of the long ago. We apply it to the present time. The Church is still at work with power. Pentecost may never repeat itself as it did on that great day when Peter preached. But Pentecost, Reformation, Revival, are the most important current events of the hour. The Lord is still "adding to the Church, daily, such as should be saved."

We no longer travel by stage-coach, but we are traveling. Old-time methods are giving way to new-time methods. The times have changed but God has not changed. Men have changed in many ways but "Jesus Christ is the same, yesterday, today, forever." The first-century passion is revealed in the twentieth-century program. Perhaps we are not saved by the same process, but we are certainly saved by the same power. The Evangel Flame is still the Evangel Flame, warming our hearts, melting our wills, softening our hardness, making pliable our human clay, fashioning it after the Divine pattern, into the likeness of Jesus.

In the last analysis, the Church is not a denomination but an inspiration, and we think not of any Church in particular but the Church in general. In the words of Beecher it is "the organized compassion of God." It is in the words of Phillips Brooks, "a company of good hearts bound together in love." It is the magnificent brotherhood and Christlike love that draw men and nations in co-operative endeavor and mutual sympathy, in the interest of the greatest good for the greatest number.
R. B.

The Tempted Soul

SATURDAY. 1 Cor. 10:13. "God is faithful who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able, but will with the temptation make a way of escape that ye may be able to bear it. Flee then to God each time you are tempted. By prayer, maintain the lines of communication between yourself and the throne."

There are three guards standing over against our lives. The first is "God is faithful"; the second "He will not suffer us to be tempted above what we are able"; the third, "He will make a way of escape."

Temptations are always present—personal; if resisted, the soul is not sin stained; every time one resists, the soul is on the road to victory; each time temptation comes, a choice is necessary. But God is present to help us choose the right.

Tempted soul, put God to the test! The testings of life do not come because God is angry with you; but there is something that the Devil desires, and if we would consider the temptation is in a way, a kind of tribute, we would realize what James means when he says: "Count it all joy when you fall into diverse temptations." The one who does not suffer temptation is dead. There is pardon for every sin, balm for every hurt, clothing beautiful, instead of our rags. There is warmth to cheer our cold hearts, a rock upon which to build. He is all this and more. And is His willingness, ability and readiness not to be met by a responsiveness on our part?

"Prophecy Explained"

By DR. GEORGE H. PATCH

Outside of the Bible itself, this book gives the strongest reassurance for both the present and the future life, and the highest encouragement to so live here and now that we may spread in other hearts the knowledge of and love for the Kingdom, the goodness of our Heavenly Father and the assurance of the ultimate triumph of all His plans for the redemption of the world. Our lives here will find a nobler impulse, a new objective and purpose, in contrast with which the passion for wealth, pleasure and worldly indulgence will appear puerile and worthless. The book makes it clear that to seek the Divine forgiveness now, to serve God in loving obedience, to follow Jesus' example and love our fellowmen are the only things worth striving for.

1 Vol. 12 mo. Cloth (size 7 $\frac{1}{2}$ x5 inches) 480 Pages of Large Type

A very large proportion of the letters received by the Christian Herald deal with Prophecy, showing the wide-spread desire for greater light on this most vital of all topics. Here is an opportunity for every one who is interested in the prophetic writings to get the light they need. As we feel that they will welcome these revelations, for Dr. Patch is no sensational writer, nor an alarmist, but a sound and reverent Christian scholar, who diffuses comfort, encouragement and consolation in what he writes.

PROMISES 1921-22

Precious Bible Promises

A Book of Inspiration

By SAMUEL CLARKE, D.D.

Contains over 2000 Bible Promises:

1. Bible Promises to Believers.
2. Bible Promises Relating to Troubles in Life.
3. Bible Promises of Spiritual Blessings in This Life.
4. Bible Promises of Blessings in the Future World.

And many other chapters containing over 2,000 inspirational promises from the Bible.

From Dr. Watts' foreword to the first editions:

"The worthy author of this collection, whom I have long known with esteem and honor, has chosen to reduce all the most useful and important promises of the Word of God to order, and here set them before us. These are the most powerful motives of duty; these are the constant food of a living Christian. And in such a world as this where duties perpetually demand for practice, and difficulties and trials are ever surrounding us, what can we do better than to treasure up these promises in our hearts, which are the most effectual persuasives to fulfill the one and sustain the other? Here are laid up the true riches of a Christian, and his highest hopes on this side of heaven.

The materials which are collected here are all of the finest, and the disposition of them is elegant and singular, so that it is an easy matter to find something suited to the frame of our souls, or our present wants on every occasion; and that soul who knows that a suitable promise is worth in an hour of darkness or temptation, will never think such a work as this, and such a various treasure, can have sufficient value set upon it."

1 Vol. 16mo. Cloth (size 6x3 3/4 inches)

AND THOUGHTS FOR DAILY MEDITATION

Special Offer to Our Readers

The Scripture Text Calendar for 1922, with its combination of the beauties of art with the daily words of inspiration from the Bible, will meet with general approval. The art work, including both the front page and the inside pictures, is reproduced in the beautiful four-color process printing.

COVER DESIGN

A reproduction of the famous painting, "Master I Perish," is the principal feature of the cover design of the Scripture Text Calendar.

TWELVE WORKS OF ART

Besides the cover design, the calendar contains a four-color picture for each month. We present herewith a list of these works of art:

- JANUARY—Christ Healing the Sick Child.
FEBRUARY—Returning from Jerusalem.
MARCH—The Story of the Good Samaritan.
APRIL—He Is Risen.
MAY—Christ Teaching Little Children.
JUNE—The Son of a Carpenter.
JULY—Christ Going Through the Wheat Field.
AUGUST—Christ and the Fallen Woman.
SEPTEMBER—Jesus Sitting by the Sea of Galilee.
OCTOBER—The Rainbow Promise.
NOVEMBER—The Story of Jacob's Ladder.
DECEMBER—The Holy Night.

By referring to the Scripture Text Calendar you can tell what the Sunday School Lesson will be for any Sunday in 1922—an aid to the busy teacher.

A 200-YEAR CALENDAR

On the back of the Calendar is a 200-Year Calendar, by the use of which you can locate the day of the week on which you were born, or any important event in recent history; in fact, the dates within two centuries. A table of the Easter Sundays between 1860 and 1955 is given; also a table showing Standard Time Around the World. These educational features add to the practical utility of the calendar and enhance its value to old and young.

Actual size 16 x 9 1/4 inches

Every page printed on fine enameled paper in full colors

As an adornment for the walls of the home, this famous picture, artistically adapted to the cover design of the Scripture Text Calendar for 1922, is one which speaks eloquently, conveying to the beholder a suggestion of hope and good cheer.

Telling the Bible's Story

How You May Use Narratives to Vitalize the Sunday School Lesson

By EDNAH FARRIER

STRANGE how, having forgotten all else that has transpired in the classroom during a long and monotonous day, the school child will remember a story the teacher used to illustrate an otherwise unflavored fact, or to "fill in" a recitation period. Strange how, in later life, an otherwise dry-as-dust lecture or sermon is made to recur in the mind of an adult by the same token.

The successful teacher is the one who can vitalize the lesson with a story which brings it down to the every day life of the pupil. For the most part the Bible is written in narratives. It is civilization's richest store of narrative material, and he who would expound it must learn to relate narratives. It seems we never tire of them.

Over in the dimmest recess of the Sunday school room Mr. Jones is surrounded by a breathless circle of boys. Through the repressed bustle of the activities of the other classes, his quiet, well-modulated voice is holding them spell-bound. The secret is obvious. He is telling a story. Jones is very seldom forced to rely on a "bear story" either. He tells the story that is the prescribed lesson for the day. But he tells it. And the boys listen.

Jones has found the art, whether natural or acquired, of story-telling. It is one of the oldest arts in the world, but only recently has the discovery been made that its prerogatives are for more than a favored few. Any one can learn the rules and attempt to practise them, and for the Sunday school teacher no quality, aside from sincerity, is so effective in presenting the lesson.

second don't is this: Don't fail to gauge correctly the mental caliber and experience of your audience. People like only that which they know.

Dr. Richard G. Moulton, who is himself a delightful story-teller, gives a few lights on the preparation for the telling of a Bible narrative. First of all, says Dr. Moulton, the narrator should saturate himself with the story as given in the text. When he has properly assimilated it, the play of his imagination may be used in its rendering, for he must "move through the scenes of the narrative with the outlook and emotions of the men or the children of today."

Since the Bible story is so simple in outline it is often helpful to add to it details as to the thoughts of the characters in connection with the incidents which are told. The story must not, however, be overloaded with fictitious events or descriptions untrue to the time of the story. For example, the story of Rebekah may be made more attractive by suggesting, or letting the children suggest, the thoughts of Rebekah as she comes to the well before performing her courteous act for the old servant.

Likewise the method of subtraction should be used in omitting details or events for which the young person is not in sympathy. Examples such as the attempted sacrifice of Isaac or a full description of David's sin will occur to the mind of the teacher. Dr. Moulton also suggests concrete ways of making the story more real—pictures, curios, costumes, map-drawing, picture-tracing and the stereograph.

With older children, or with younger ones when the story is simple in language and outline, the narrative may sometimes be presented practically in the language of the Bible with telling effect, if the teacher knows how to make it live by the manner of the telling. A settlement worker found this particularly effective with a group of Jewish girls, and after a few stories had been told in Biblical language she found herself able to hold her audience easily by a sympathetic reading of the narrative from the Bible itself. It was then only a step for the girls to read the stories for themselves from their copies of the Bible.

A special committee on story-telling reported to the Playgrounds Conference that it is important to tell a few good stories, interesting stories and stories that mean something, rather than to tell many stories. What recommendation more ably fits the job of the Sunday school teacher? Here also is an argument for repeating the most important and interesting lessons many times during the year.

Perhaps one of the pupils may tell from the platform in story form the particular lesson which has proved the favorite of the month.

The simplicity, candor, richness of material, and religious purpose of the Bible story should make every Sunday school teacher convinced that she has at hand a means of powerful appeal to children of all ages. The old attitude of some teachers, causing children to shy at Bible stories when labeled as such, has changed with the new Sunday school psychology. But much is yet to be learned about the joy and delight for the child in the well-presented Bible story.

An eight-page bulletin containing in brief the philosophy and principles of story-telling, lists of stories for various ages, and suggestions for "story-playing" has been issued by Community Service, New York City. In his book "Manual of Stories" William Byron Forbush offers a list of Bible stories classified under the characteristics which they chiefly emphasize, as well as a parallel list of non-Bible stories. The Sunday school teacher armed with such sources of information and with a willingness to make the lesson as attractive and as useful as possible to the pupils will have little chance for failure.

The PRICELESS INGREDIENT

In the city of Bagdad lived Hakeem, the Wise One, and many people went to him for counsel, which he gave freely to all, asking nothing in return.

There came to him a young man, who had spent much but got little, and said: "Tell me, Wise One, what shall I do to receive the most for that which I spend?"

Hakeem answered, "A thing that is bought or sold has no value unless it contain that which cannot be bought or sold. Look for the Priceless Ingredient."

"But, what is this Priceless Ingredient?" asked the young man.

Spoke then the Wise One, "My son, the Priceless Ingredient of every product in the market-place is the Honor and Integrity of him who makes it. Consider his name before you buy."

Three words of this old tale—"The Priceless Ingredient"—tell the story of the House of Squibb, revealing the secret of its service and success.

E. R. Squibb & Sons was founded in 1858 by Dr. Edward R. Squibb, a physician and chemist of high principles and ideals. He was inspired, not by hope of financial gain (for he had money enough for all his needs), but by professional duty and personal honor. His aim was to set a new and higher standard in chemical and pharmaceutical manufacture, by making products of greater purity than had yet been known.

Within three years the Squibb Laboratories had attained a position of leadership. In 1861 the Government of the United States turned confidently to Squibb for products needed for a million men in our Civil War. That was sixty years ago. The reputation so early won, the House of Squibb holds today inviolate and values far above profits.

In 1917, as in 1861, the United States Government again turned confidently to Squibb for products needed for millions of men in the World War, and after the War, conferred upon the House of Squibb the Award for Distinguished Service.

For more than half a century the name Squibb has been recognized as full guaranty of skill, knowledge and honor in the manufacture of chemical and pharmaceutical products made exclusively for the medical profession and used only by the physician and the surgeon.

The name Squibb on HOUSEHOLD PRODUCTS is equally valued as positive assurance of true purity and reliability.

Squibb's Bicarbonate of Soda—exceedingly pure, therefore without bitter taste.

Squibb's Epsom Salt—free from impurities. Preferred also for taste.

Squibb's Sodium Phosphate—a specially purified product, free from arsenic, therefore safe.

Squibb's Cod Liver Oil—selected finest Norwegian; cold pressed; pure in taste. Rich in vitamins.

Squibb's Olive Oil—selected oil from Southern France. Absolutely pure. (Sold only through druggists.)

Squibb's Sugar of Milk—specially refined for preparing infants' food. Quickly soluble. In sealed tins.

Squibb's Boric Acid—pure and perfectly soluble. Soft powder for dusting; granular form for solution.

Squibb's Castor Oil—specially refined, bland in taste; dependable.

Squibb's Stearate of Zinc—a soft and protective powder of highest purity.

Squibb's Magnesia Dental Cream—made from Squibb's Milk of Magnesia. Contains no soap or other detrimental substance. Corrects mouth acidity.

Squibb's Talcum Powder—Carnation, Violet, Boudoir and Unscented. The talcum powder par excellence.

Squibb's Cold Cream—and exquisite preparation of correct composition for the care of the skin.

Paul's Voyage and Shipwreck

International Sunday School Lesson for November 27

Acts 27:1-44

By REV. SAMUEL D. PRICE, D.D.

A HALF-HOUR of lesson study cannot exhaust the subject for today. It is one of the richest in subject material of all in this six months' course on the Life of Paul. Acts XXVII is the classic sea chapter of the Bible. There is action all the way through. The chapter makes many exact geographical and nautical statements. There were 276 on that grain ship from Alexandria, Egypt, to Italy. Regardless of the supposed importance of the passengers Paul was the greatest and his presence related the others to recorded history. With him were Dr. Luke and Aristarchus, who may have obtained the privilege of accompanying the prisoner to Rome only by classing themselves as his slaves. The centurion in charge was named Julius, of the Imperial soldiery; the captain and owner appear by title only.

Classes of boys can be fascinated by the nautical items of the journey. One of the fullest accounts, involving all questions of seamanship, will be found in James Smith's "Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul." This book may be obtained in some public libraries. Those who have Sir William Ramsay's "St. Paul the Traveller and the Roman Citizen," will find sufficient material in his chapter on The Voyage to Rome. The start was made at Caesarea, on a ship which took them to Myra. Ramsay dates the embarking on August 17 and the transfer at Myra September 1. The prevailing winds at that season were such that the ship had to go to the westward and above the island of Cyprus. The exactness of each statement, as proved by extraneous facts, produces a deep impression concerning the accuracy of the Bible. If you know of a doubter, have him study Acts XXVII and verify all the items by reference to geography and navigation. He will land safely at Malta, declaring as Paul did, "I believe God."

At Myra the centurion transferred his precious prisoner to a grain-laden ship which was en route to Italy, having started from Egypt. Ships of Paul's day could not sail by tacking at will, but had to wait for favorable wind and weather. There was even a closed season, during which there was great danger for any vessel to leave port: this was from September to November. You will observe that "The Fast" is mentioned, which means the Day of Atonement, and this occurred on October 5 in 59 A. D.

FAIR HAVENS, CRETE, was reached with some difficulty. Paul, a frequent traveler, though a landsman, advised that due patience be exercised in the interest of safety of both life and property, and that the ship should now be securely tied up at that port. The captain and the owner, however, decided that Phoenix, about forty miles distant, would be the better winter port, and they were further encouraged "when the south wind blew softly." A start was then made for a supposedly short run almost before the wind. Scarcely had they left Fair Havens when a tempestuous, opposing wind rushed down upon them, and a memorable, historic run began.

Young people, especially, should be taught much from the words, "when the south wind blew softly." They want to do something against which they have been well advised by those of maturer minds and of far greater experience; but they can't take "No" for an answer. They are determined to sail on regardless, and when some favoring circumstance appears close at hand they sail away, often to their own speedy destruction. The south wind cannot blow softly very long at certain seasons of the year. Putting forth under such circumstances indicates that the captain is not worthy of his office. Many headstrong young people suffer as wrecks on the shores of life.

Under the lee of Cauda, Paul doubtless helped draw the little water-logged, trailing boat on board. Luke here uses the personal pronoun "we." Bands were placed about the vessel amidship to help meet the heavy strain of the one big mast. Pointing close up into the wind, with the little canvas that would hold, they were driven sideways for fourteen days. The supposed nearness of the African Syrtis caused them to lighten the ship in every way that was possible, by casting equipment and cargo overboard.

Relative values is a subject of vital importance at all times, and not only when a ship is in distress on the high seas. Life is always rated above cargo. Regardless of the importance of landing a valuable load, whether of freight or passengers, the captain will turn aside to respond to a S. O. S. call or to rescue just one man who may be sighted in distress in some little boat. Then when storm comes, and the ship is in danger, cargo of great value will be cast overboard, if that will aid in saving the passengers on the vessel.

Each of us must consider carefully and constantly with reference to the weight that we are carrying on our voyage of life. Our cargo should, even now, be worth while, or go overboard at once. It is foolish to expend energy and exclude other things, to carry that which will not pay well in the end since there are so many worth-while things that we can ship. When a man, speaking of his activities, says "I am loaded to the limit," it would be advantageous for him to look carefully over his manifest. It is prudent to have a reasonable margin of safety at the Plimsoll mark. It is always common sense to lighten your ship for safer sailing. You can at least drop overboard such things as worry, anger, fear and hate.

JUST one passenger can have a tremendous influence on an entire ship's company. Leadership is easily noted among the passengers every time you cross the ocean. Some one on board seems to become the center of the social or religious life, and their influence will count for good or ill with many who are ready to have their idle time directed by some strong one. Two remarkable tourists can be here placed in contrast—Jonah and Paul. Jonah was endangering the lives of all and the ship could not be saved while he was on board. Paul became the saviour of no less than 275 others and meanwhile he had been their encourager. It is safe to say that Paul's personality was dominant for good on both of those Mediterranean ships.

Paul was not concerned for his own safety. He had been assured by his Heavenly Father when at Jerusalem that he must bear witness also at Rome. One such promise was enough and Paul just trusted implicitly. He was, however, eager for the lives of his close friends and sailing companions. For all these he petitioned Almighty God. Angels can bring divine messages to God's children any time and any where. "Yes" was the answer to Paul's petition. Then Paul, though a prisoner-passenger, assumed the position of acting captain and with wonderful results. The heaven-sent message was repeated to all and they were advised to take food. It is thrillingly interesting to observe that public thanksgiving was given to Jehovah on that non-Christian ship before the meal was served. Thanksgiving Day in the United States is rich with meaning and joy, but for the Christian, every day is a day of both thanksgiving and of thanksgiving. Every Sunday must also be a day of special giving of thanks and paying of vows.

The story of the landing on Malta is graphically given by Luke, the most significant statement being "All Safe!" That is always the cheering message when we are sailing according to the promises of God.

Why You Meet

So many white teeth everywhere today

Do you note how many teeth now glisten as they never did before?

Nearly all the world over, careful people are employing a new teeth-cleaning method. And largely by dental advice. It is daily used by millions.

You see the results in every circle now. They should be seen in your home. Make the test we offer here, if you have not done so.

They combat the film

Most teeth are clouded more or less by film. That viscous coat you feel is film, but newly-formed.

Film clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. It absorbs stains, making the teeth look dingy. Film is the basis of tartar.

Those thin film-coats now hide the luster of millions of pretty teeth.

Film is the teeth's great enemy. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

It constantly breeds germs. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea, now so alarmingly common.

Thus most tooth troubles are now traced to film. Those troubles have been constantly increasing. Even among careful people, very few escape.

The brush inadequate

Most people find that well-brushed teeth discolor and decay. The reason lies largely in that film. The ordinary tooth paste does not effectively combat it. The brush leaves much of it intact.

That is a problem which dental science has in late years tried to solve. It has sought effective film combatants for daily application.

Two such factors have been found. Able authorities have proved them by many careful tests. Now leading dentists everywhere—here and abroad—are urging their daily use.

These two methods are combined in a dentifrice called Pepsodent. And the whiter, cleaner teeth you see are largely due to that.

Other new discoveries

Science also finds that starch deposits do much damage to the teeth. They gum the teeth, get between

The New Requirements

Constantly combat the film.

Keep teeth highly polished.

Multiply the starch digestant in saliva to digest the starch deposits on teeth and between them.

Multiply the alkalinity of saliva to neutralize mouth acids.

Pepsodent does all these things effectively and often.

The quick effects

Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

These benefits are quickly seen and felt.

This Test

Will show the way

This offers you a ten-day test of Pepsodent—no cost.

The test will be delightful—the results a revelation.

What you see and feel will change your whole conception of what clean teeth mean.

Make this test—make it now, if only for beauty's sake.

Beautiful teeth in this way become whiter and safer, too.

the teeth, ferment and form acids. Modern diet is very rich in starch.

Nature puts a starch digestant in the saliva, to digest those starch deposits. But this needs frequent stimulation, else it is too weak.

Pepsodent supplies that stimulation. It multiplies the starch digestant in saliva. It also multiplies the alkalis—put there to neutralize mouth acids.

So every use of Pepsodent greatly increases these natural teeth-protecting forces. In all these ways, Pepsodent brings conspicuous benefits which old ways never bring.

For the future's sake

Under old methods, very few people have escaped tooth troubles. Very few children escape them. Most people have film-coated teeth.

Now dentists advise that children use Pepsodent from the time the first tooth appears. Everyone should use it twice a day.

That means a constant and effective fight on film and starch and acids. And that may change your whole dental history.

Cut out this coupon and judge the benefits by what this ten-day test will do. There are few things more important, you will find.

Peter and the Angels

It was early Saturday morning that Peter saw his mother had something on her mind. She always stroked his little red head in just that manner when she was preparing him for a test of courage, or the facing of a disagreeable duty.

"Great, big man—" She always called him a big man at such a time, too—"could you do a dreadfully brave thing to help Mother?"

Peter waited for more details before committing himself.

"Mother's got to go away. See, dear, how bare the cupboard is." Peter did not need to look. He knew its bareness well enough. "Mother would like to see good things in that cupboard Easter Sunday, and to get them she's got to go away. She won't be able to get back until late, very late tonight. Will you stay here?"

"All alone?"

IT WAS a lovely thing to be brave, Peter knew it. But he couldn't help his toes curling up with terror at the thought of staying in those rooms alone at night, when big shadows swooped down upon a fellow from all corners.

She tried to reassure him.

"As soon as it gets dark, Mrs. Brown will come down and light up. And don't you touch it, Peter. And she'll come and stay with you after Mr. Brown has had his supper, but he doesn't come home until eight, you know. Will you stay here and fight dragons until that time?"

Peter could do no more than nod. When he spoke, he wanted his voice to sound brave, but his toes hadn't yet uncurred. He trotted around, following every step of his mother while she got ready, and partly forgot his fear in curiosity when she took a gold chain from the bureau drawer. Peter knew that chain. He had sometimes been allowed to hang it about his neck. It was to be his some day, he knew.

"I'm just going to borrow it," said Peter's mother. "I'll get it back some day for you, Laddie, but we've just got to have something in that cupboard. Supposing some one should come here Easter?"

"Angels?" questioned Peter, and Peter's mother smiled.

He felt dreadfully brave after she had left—until the big shadows swooped down upon him. He was fighting them valiantly when Mrs. Brown came down. She wasn't a bit like Mother, and he was almost glad to have her go again. But there are lots and lots of queer noises when a boy's alone in a house. Maybe 'twas just the rustling of angel wings he heard. He got out the big Bible and turned the pages until he came to the picture of Easter morning.

"It was very early in the morning, before the sun was up, that the angel came and rolled the great big stone away."

He tried to tell the story to himself, just as he had heard his mother tell it, but the sound of his voice breaking the stillness of the room hushed him into frightened silence.

To make his toes uncurl he thought of Dad, bravely fighting dragons behind those tall locked gates, and those stones that were much too heavy for Peter's strength. Oh, why wouldn't an angel come and help!

"I don't believe there is an angel." He almost said it, but Mother's words came back to restrain him, and he winked rapidly lest he should see Doubt, more fearful than any dragon, advancing upon him.

"Maybe there is," he admitted hurriedly. "Maybe I've just missed 'em. Maybe they only come in the morning."

TOMORROW morning he would get up early and go to the gates of the prison. He did not know just how he was going to get out without awakening Mother, but he would have faith. She said, with faith a person could do 'most anything.

Though he had intended to refuse to go to bed until she came home, when Mrs. Brown came down he requested to be helped at once with the buttons. He couldn't get up early until he'd been asleep; therefore, he prepared for sleep at once, laid the new suit across the chair, placed the new shoes beside it.

But when he crawled into bed and screwed his eyes together, sleep wouldn't come. He grew peevish and was tossing about and banging pillows when his mother came. He only half responded to her kiss as she crept into bed beside him.

"What time is it, Muvver?" he asked shrilly, and was dismayed at her answer.

Nearly 'leven! He never had been awake as late as that. There was nothing to do now but stay awake, and so he was ready at the first signal of daylight. He propped his eyes open and stared where he knew the gray suit was. First thing he knew, he was winking desperately. Guess his eyes were full of cinders. And then—then—

Why, it was morning, a very gray and early morning, but light enough to outline the suit and shining shoes.

He wondered if he could climb over Muvver without waking her. Cautiously he raised himself on one elbow. Her place was empty! She, too, had been prompted to rise early. He could hear her now in the kitchen. That was the oven door that clicked. She was making preparations for some one—angels, maybe.

Peter's little soul was almost extinguished by the wave of bitterness that swept over it. Faith! See what it had brought him. He buried his little red head in the pillow and wished that Muvver never had asked him to be a big man, because big men don't cry. Big men fight. Peter's fists doubled. He was good at fighting.

Straightway he got out of bed. He wasn't even particular about doing it quietly. He was going to get into that new suit and those shining shoes, and he was going to the prison. If he hurried dressing and ran all the way, he could get there while it was still early morning.

He neglected some of the buttons, and it was a dreadfully rumpled little red head that he jammed his cap upon. He would need his coat, too, and that hung from a high hook. He dragged a chair across the room and climbed upon it. With the coat in his arms he looked across to the window, drew the chair over to it, and looked out. It was quite a drop for a little fellow. So he told himself. But, if he landed on his coat—maybe the cap would help some, too. He threw both out, shut his eyes, and jumped.

When he picked himself up, one hand was bleeding and there was a hole in his stocking, but the new suit was intact. He crowded the cap on his rumpled hair again and ran. His desperate hurry made it seem a long, long way this morning. The coat was heavy, too, carrying, but he liked the swagger of the new suit.

WHEN the high fence and the stone buildings back of it loomed in the distance, he half closed his eyes and counted fifty before widely opening them again.

There stood, unchanged, the two huge stones, and the iron gates upon them, fast closed. Nowhere was there a sign of angels. Maybe he was too early. He leaned against one of the stone pillars, pressed his face against the bars and looked and looked.

Easter came early. It was a blustering day, and the sun had not been up long enough to warm the earth. A chilliness succeeded the warmth produced by running. The wind cut through his shoulders and he shivered, but still he clasped the iron rails.

A quarter of an hour passed, and Peter turned away. He put his coat on then and buttoned it. The new suit mattered not. There weren't any angels. He didn't believe there was any Dad, either.

He hung his little red head as he said this to himself. He remembered that he had promised his mother never to say such a thing again. Hastily he made amends. "I believe in Dad."

he whispered, "I believe in Dad." And back he turned to the gates.

A car went down the road. Peter did not turn, though the blast of the horn quivered in his ears. The car turned, came back, and stopped by the curbing. A friendly voice called, "Peter."

Peter slowly looked around. "Waiting for Dad?" his friend asked gently.

Peter's lips almost said, "I don't believe I have a Dad," but he gulped quickly and transposed his thoughts.

"There ain't any angels, are there?" he asked.

"Now, now," cautioned the other, "don't you go to losing faith in angels, Peter, just as I'm beginning to believe in them. They've been flying round this old place for weeks. Like to get in there where Dad is?"

Peter had no need to answer. He was picked up and whisked away in the car. He thought, at first, they were leaving the prison. The road wound around, branched from the main road. A gate was opened in silence. They were within the walls.

A little shiver passed through Peter as he thought of Muvver on the outside. Would he be able to get out to her again? He remembered what Tony Ragelli had told him:

"It's dead easy to git in, but you have to whistle to git out."

HIS eyes were big with speculation as they stopped before a building. The officer went in and came out with another man. Peter did not know him, but the stranger walked right up to the car and said, "Peter, Peter."

"What am I thankful for?"

"For the prospect of an awakening world to the power of Jesus. For the signs in the Church of a spiritual baptism such as the Church in America has not known in a century. For a growing sense of the value of men, so that selfish ambition and ignorant nationalism shall no longer create the horrors of war; for the promises of God's Word that His truth shall prevail; for the presence in the White House and around the Cabinet table of Christian men who are not ashamed of their faith; for the abiding love of fathers and mothers which all the hotels and apartment houses in the world can not kill; for national prohibition, which all its enemies can not make a failure; for a response to the Gospel preaching and the growing respect for the Bible. And a thousand other things in human life."

And the Minister, as he paced his study reading over the human docu-

Peter drew back, then heard a voice say sorrowfully:

"Dad's a hungry man, Peter. Can't you give him a kiss?"

"Are you Dad?" His eyes devoured the face drawing closer to his own. His lips quivered, and further softened to a kiss.

"But if you're hungry," he said a minute later, "you'd better come right home. Muvver's cooking lots of things."

The officer motioned Dad into the car. "I'll take you home. Now, Peter, shut your eyes, and don't open them until I say the word."

Peter hid his face in Dad's coat until told to look. And, lo, the angels had been there. The gates were open. They were on the outside.

Now Peter's heart began to trouble him because of Muvver. Did she think he was still sleeping? Had she missed him yet?

She had, just ten minutes ago, and had searched all through the tenement. Her face was white, and from her eyes had fled the look of misty gladness.

"Muvver," he shouted shrilly, "Dad's killed all the dragons. He's come home to stay."

Peter's shout drew her attention to the car and to the man who leaped out and ran up the steps with him.

"I got my pardon, honey. I told you I'd be with you at Easter."

The little woman crept into his arms.

"My Very Dearest!"

Twice she said it. And the light in the eyes of Peter deepened. He whispered to the angels:

"I thought that was his name."

ments he had found in his parish, suddenly broke into a hymn of praise:

"For all the blessings of the year,
For life and love and friendship's cheer,
For work and faith, for endless days,
We give to Thee, O Lord, the praise.

"For truth that conquers falsehood's might,
For wrong defeated by the right,
For the Unchanging Christ who stays—
We give to Thee, O Lord, the praise.

"For Home and Church and Native Land,
For daily task and working hand,
Our grateful anthem we upraise—
To Thee, O Lord, is all the praise."

And with this song upon his lips and in his heart, the Minister went into his pulpit with his Thanksgiving sermon and those who had come in with thankless hearts went away saying:

"After all, life is good! God is good. I will no more be ungrateful. Let everything that hath breath, praise the Lord! Bless the Lord, O my soul! And forget not all His benefits!"

In the Kitchen of the Zoo

A VISIT to the kitchen of a big zoological garden will convince anybody that the man who takes several hundred assorted animals to board has plenty of work to do.

The hardest as well as the most important thing about such work is to find out just what will agree best with each individual boarder. As there are few creatures more easily upset than wild animals in captivity, the task is by no means easy.

The kitchen is apt to be in a basement under one of the animal houses. Here a hot fire burns a good deal of the time while food simmers in double boilers and bakes in the ovens. One oven is always full of brown bread for the bears, great square loaves over a foot in diameter and about three inches high. It is almost as solid as a rock, and made of whole wheat, bran, graham flour and molasses, and the bears thrive upon it.

With the exception of the polar bears, the bruin family does not get meat at the zoos. For variety the bears have huge cakes of rice mixed with eggs and milk.

A zoo of fair size will use from 150 to 200 pounds of fresh meat a day. Beef is the only kind of meat used, and almost all of it is served raw. The mere cutting of it is quite an undertaking. The big joints for the lions, tigers and animals of that class do not take long. But there are dozens and dozens of little pieces about the size of a man's finger which are cut from the lean portion and put in the big cages for eagles, vultures, owls and other flesh-eating birds.

They are not thrown in carelessly either, but are placed one by one along the branches used for perches, and here and there on the rocks or other objects in the cages, far enough apart to prevent danger of two birds coming into conflict over them.

Kegs and baskets filled with chopped vegetables, all kinds mixed up together, turnips, carrots, potatoes, are served every day. Some of them were chopped more finely than others. The tapirs, for instance, get a great mass of these vegetables cut almost as small as the diced vegetables served on our own tables.

Monkeys are the only animals that care for onions. They are the only animals, too, which get cooked meat. The monkeys have a great deal more variety in their food than any other zoo boarder. They eat bananas, bread, cooked potatoes—a great many things not favored by other zoo folks.

Free Investment Circulars

Interesting and valuable investment literature published from time to time by the leading Banks and Investment Houses are now available for Christian Herald Readers.

As a convenience to you we have arranged with these financial concerns to send direct to you these investment circulars. Write us asking for them by number or simply checking list and write name and address plainly on the margin. Financial Department, The Christian Herald, 99 Bible House, New York City.

Conservative Bonds—Current bond circulars, describing recent issues of high-grade bonds, with full details of security, yield, etc. Ask for Circular No. 1.
Public Utility Securities—Circular No. 2, describes a variety of public utility bonds and preferred stock issues, well secured and offering a high yield at present prices.
Real Estate Bonds—Several booklets issued by investment houses in different sections of the country present the advantages of real estate bonds and notes—the oldest and basic form of investment. These issues yield 6 per cent. to 7 per cent. Ask for Circulars 4-6 for city real estate bonds, and Circulars 7-9 for farm mortgages and bonds.

Partial Payment Investing—This method enables investors to buy sound securities by making payments monthly until the bond or preferred stock is fully paid for. Meanwhile all interest or dividends accrue from the time the investment is begun. Ask for Circular 11.

To Invest $25 or More—Two-year time deposit certificates paying 6 per cent. and 5 per cent. certificates payable on demand, secured by first mortgages, can be bought in multiples of $25. Ask for Circular 13.

Liberty Bonds—Circular No. 14 describes the various issues of Liberty Bonds and the remarkable investment opportunities they offer at the present time.

Standard Gas & Electric Co., 6 per cent. gold notes, at a price to yield nearly 10 per cent. are described in Circular 28.

Deere & Co., 10 year gold notes to yield 8.40%. Business, farm implements. Founded by John Deere in 1837. Ask for circular No. 51.

Circular No. 50 gives complete information on Federal Farm Loan Bonds. They pay 5% and are tax exempt. Farm Mortgages—details also circulars regarding 6 per cent. First Mortgage Farm Loan Certificates issued in denominations of $100, $500 and $1,000. Send for Circular 38.

Foreign Bonds—opportunities for obtaining Foreign Municipal Bonds with yearly drawings at par giving high average yield of 12 1/4 per cent.—Danish Internal Loans, Norwegian and Scandinavian Bonds. Booklet 48.

Bonds—questions answered, terms defined. A very valuable non-technical booklet that every prospective bond buyer should have. No. 42.

Selecting Your Investments, Strong Box Investments, Creating Good Investments, are three booklets describing the service and safe, high yield investments of a nationally known investment house. No. 43.

How Henry Wilkinson Became Rich—Booklet 52 is the story of the man who was satisfied with Safety and a Fair yield on his investments. Persistence, Patience and sound judgment made him financially independent.

A Pagan Priest's Ingenuity

AMONG some Indian tribes of the southwestern United States the followers of the Jesus Road are severely persecuted. Sometimes physical violence is used. At other times the most subtle influences are brought to bear upon the faithful Christian; he is ostracised, reviled, denied his tribal rights, and in other ways made to feel the sting of hate.

White Bull had been a faithful Christian for many years. He had been educated at the government school and was generally considered one of the most intelligent and faithful Christians of his tribe. After a time he was made an interpreter for the missionary whose church he had joined. He was sent to Washington several times to represent his people before the government.

During these years he had been repeatedly persecuted in petty ways, but none of these things moved him. On more than one occasion he had been threatened with bodily injury, unless he participated in the heathen customs of his tribe. Through it all he had stood steadfast. We thought him tried and proven. Then the mescal or peyote religion came from the south and swept many of his tribe into its toils.

THE peyote is the dried flower of a certain kind of cactus. When eaten it has a profound narcotic influence upon its victims. It induces various hallucinations and, in proportion as used, has a permanent stupefying influence and exercises other baneful, physical and moral effects. Our best scientists have thus far been unable to find any really beneficial use whatever for it.

This religion is more subtle than other Indian religions because, when it enters a tribe where Christianity has taken hold, the peyote priests erect their altars, use the Bible and profess to pray to Jesus. They claim that the peyote is the Indian way of finding and coming into communication with Jesus. They also claim medicinal qualities for the peyote when the religious claims will not attract. Many an Indian has taken peyote as a medicine only to find himself addicted to the drug and committed to the religion before he realizes it.

White Bull's wife was not as staunch a Christian as he, and her family were heathen. She became very ill and her family insisted that she should try peyote. White Bull would not allow it. The contest went on between White Bull and the parents of the wife for some weeks. Finally, the parents of the wife declared they knew of peyote cures of persons similarly afflicted and insisted that if White Bull did not give his consent, he did not love his wife and they would take her away from him and also rob him of his children. Such action would have had the support of the tribal customs.

IN DESPERATION White Bull consented to the use of peyote on condition that they would not ask him to participate in the worship. The peyote priest was sent for and pitched his tent near the house of the sick woman. He was informed of the conditions and agreed to them. It would cost a great deal, but the husband was willing to pay if it would heal his wife and preserve his family.

For hours the priest went through his incantations over the woman. At length he came to the husband and told him that he could do nothing because the spirits would not believe that the husband wanted his wife cured unless he himself came into the tent and told them so. White Bull demurred, but at length at the renewed insistence of his wife's parents, went into the tent on the stipulation that he himself should not partake of the peyote.

Again the incantations proceeded, but without avail, and the husband was informed by the priest that the spirits had said they would do nothing for the woman until her husband showed his sincerity by eating some peyote. After much argument and delay, he yielded on condition that he should be required to eat but one bean. Again the ceremonies proceeded, but only to be held up once more by the priest telling the tortured husband that he could do nothing until he had eaten at least four peyote beans. After more threats and arguments the poor husband again yielded.

WITH our knowledge of this man's former faithfulness we have no doubt but that he would have utterly refused in the beginning if all these demands had then been made. He could have stood any suffering or deprivation of rights as long as those things touched only himself and not his wife and family. But for their sakes he yielded a little at a time until he realized that he had disgraced his Lord. His real manliness now came to the front in that he at once told all the facts to his pastor and to me. He did not attempt to add to his disgrace by denying or minimizing his offence, and desired to make such reparation as was possible. How many white Christians would have acted as well? Many would have sought to deny or palliate their sin or would have endeavored to lay the blame on some one else.

We tried to show White Bull how he had betrayed his Lord; that it was not a question of many or few peyote beans eaten but of compromising himself and his Saviour by countenancing that false religion at all. He admitted it all and hung his head, then looked up with sad face and tear-stained cheeks and asked, "But if you had been fixed as I was, what would you have done?"

That question is too hard for me, so I pass it on to you. Under all those circumstances what would you have done? Do you honestly think you would have done any better?

White Bull's family is happy again. The peyote did no good, but the wife was fully restored to health by other means. She, too, has lost all faith in peyote, either as a religion or a medicine.

another stepped up before the doctor and had her eyelids turned inside out and the inner surface treated. The pain must have been excruciating, but no complaint was heard.

Trachoma is part of the price this country is paying for deportations during the World War. The refugees returning brought this dreadful infection with them. It is a chronic disease of the eye-lids, very painful, readily transmitted from person to person, and frequently leads to blindness. Two American women, one doctor and one nurse, have contracted the trouble while on duty in Constantinople.

It was hard to sleep at Ismid. The night was so still. The only sound that broke the silence was the occasional passing of the Turkish guard, the reassuring tolling of the time on the United States destroyer anchored off shore, and the howling of the jackals in the hills. Four bells had just sounded. It was two o'clock. The door stood ajar. A faint gleam of light fell across the floor. The "Lady with the Lamp" was passing. It was no phantom figure from the past haunting familiar scenes, but our Lady with the Lamp, the living, moving prototype of the woman whose service to the sick in this very land, three generations ago, blazed the way for the women of all the world.

NEGROES are reported as owning 2,000,000 acres of land in the United States, and property valued at $1,250,000,000. Sixty years ago they were ignorant and penniless slaves; from which it would appear that hard and faithful work can still achieve miracles.

The "Bad" Little Boy

ONCE two young girls taught a kindergarten, in which there was a little boy five years old. His name was John Fleming Atthaway.

How His Teacher and Mother Brought About a Transformation

By RUTH LINING MILAM

John Fleming Atthaway had golden curls that might have been a halo for his delicately molded face. His fair coloring, his clear, round eyes, gave him the look of one of Raphael's angels.

But—John pinched the child next to him; he pulled the brown curls of the little girl who sat across the table from him; sometimes he bit his predecessor in the marching line.

"Oh," said the teacher named Alice, "did you ever know five-year-old boys got so bad?"

"Well," answered the one the children called Miss Margaret, "I'm going to see his mother."

So Margaret went to see John Fleming Atthaway's mother, who lived on the second floor of a super-exclusive apartment that tolerated her child because of her super-super-bank account.

It was a spindly legged, gilt-chair sort of place, with prim cushions and gossamer curtains, and waxed floors as shining as early dewdrops.

"Mrs. Atthaway," plunged in Margaret, the formal greetings over, "I've come to ask you to allow John to have a pet."

Mrs. Atthaway regarded her curiously a moment, as though she thought the young teacher had asked for a zoo in her parlor.

"Why," she answered coldly, "John despises animals. The nurse tells me he chases cats and dogs when she takes him for his walks, and throws stones at them."

"I imagine he does," agreed Margaret, "but if he had a pet of his own to care for, if he came to know that animals really are alive just as he is, and feel pain just as he does, I'm sure it would develop consideration for them."

"But my house—ugh! A pet! What a muss!" Mrs. Atthaway shivered daintily.

"Mrs. Atthaway," Margaret was frankly direct: "does your boy—does your boy's happiness—mean anything to you?"

"What has a pet to do with this?" The hostess was both angry and amused.

Patiently Margaret explained to the mother just the sort of tendencies her boy was exhibiting.

"Why, what a little boor! My son—impossible!"

"Mrs. Atthaway, I did not visit you this afternoon to tell you John is a bad boy, or ask you to punish him, or to criticize him in any way. I came to see if, both of us working together, we might not benefit John a great deal. I came to ask you to let your little boy be what he really is—a normal boy."

RELUCTANTLY, the pet was allowed to enter the home. John's behavior steadily improved, though it left much to be desired.

He had something to talk of now with the other children, and that drew them together more cordially. It was a natural, normal activity, just as their various pleasures were. He did not sulk so often, nor pinch and bite. Through the simple activity of earing for a little tan and black pup he had learned the meaning of life and feeling. His imagination had touched upon the experience of other living things and mitigated his desire to torture.

By frequent tactful visits, Margaret persuaded Mrs. Atthaway to allow her child half of the small, latticed back porch for his own. A swing and little climbing ladder were put there, and a narrow box of earth in which John planted peas, and eagerly tended the young vines.

Each day he had a story to relate about his garden. He was becoming one of the children most responsive to the kindergarten lessons with a sole exception.

That exception was a large one. It undermined the harmony of the whole class. In plain language, John wanted to "boss"—in diametric opposition to the foundation principle of the kindergarten, which is democracy.

At last one day, in despair, Alice asked, "John, why do you want Mary and Felix and Helen—all of your classmates—to do your way every time, and scream and shriek when they refuse?"

John answered without blinking: "Cause when I grows up I wants to be a soldier."

NOW the girls had the key, the underlying explanation, of his misconduct. From somewhere, somebody, John had gotten the idea that soldiers are meant to rule the universe. He had added this to his already formed ideal of being a soldier when he reached manhood.

Margaret and Alice did not preach at little John. They were wise enough to know that preaching at children is like shooting at birds with an unloaded gun—only a lot of clicking and no results.

But they did tell stories and play games. The stories were about knights and soldiers who were brave and kind, and always seeking to serve other folks.

There were stories about Washington's kindness and humility, and some of the kindly things and the brave things our American soldiers did in France.

When the stories were finished the children dramatized them, acting them after the fashion of small children, a very little meaning a great deal.

Then the transfiguration had reached John's heart, and John became kindly and eager to serve, where before he had been cruel and eager to hurt.

A great deal of trouble and detail!

Yes. But is it not worth a great effort to make of a small boy a big man who will serve his country and his associates for the greater good of all?

And one thing is certain in childhood, indisputable as the rising of the sun in the east. If the child is denied the natural and normal expression that is good for him, he will find his own means of attaining the unnatural and abnormal, and the bad thing the child does is bad for every one of us.

The Greatest of Charities

By KATHARINE F. REED

TO ME the most beautiful of charities is the adoption of a little child.

"Yes," you say, "it's all right if you know the parents, but supposing, as the little one grows older, dreadful, inherited tastes develop? What a calamity to be the adopted mother of perhaps a criminal! I certainly never could endure that situation."

And I answer: "Then in such a case the greater the charity. Any man or woman who, knowing that the child has probably inherited fearful vices, willingly adopts it, in spite of this, and does his or her utmost to save it for the Kingdom of Heaven, has performed the greatest of charities. Surely when even in the face of these possibilities the adopted parent is yet able to open his arms to the poor little unfortunate, with the conscientious hope of winning its soul—then I say this act is heroic and savors of the Christlike spirit. Such a one will surely have the help of God's presence in the undertaking."

Perhaps those of us who supported a "war orphan" for a year, felt we had performed a noble act. It was noble as far as it went, but did it go far enough? Suppose we adopt one such as this—a poor, degraded bit of humanity, whom nobody wants, one who has a questionable parentage and ancestry—there's your charity!

"Suffer the little children to come unto me."

will find it difficult to embark on another adventure in Hungary. Even in that isolated place, the problem of his support is an embarrassing one, for the former monarch left enormous debts in Switzerland and most of the family jewels which were in his possession have been sold. The cares of a King even in exile are not light

NEW DEMOCRATIC CHAIRMAN CHOSEN. Cordell Hull, of Carthage, Tenn., a former member of Congress, was elected chairman of the Democratic National Committee at a meeting in St. Louis, succeeding George H. White, of Ohio, who retired after strong opposition to his retention of the chairmanship had developed. Mr. Hull's election was the result of a compromise, as he was not closely allied with any of the candidates at the San Francisco convention.

PRESIDENT HARDING IS 56. President Harding's fifty-sixth birthday on November 2 did not afford an occasion for a holiday at the White House, although hundreds of congratulatory messages were received, many of them from abroad. If anything, the President worked just a little harder than usual that day and his list of callers was long.

GERMAN FINANCES IN BAD PLIGHT. With German marks, worth four to the dollar before the war, selling at 240 to the dollar and still declining, the finances of Germany were threatened with an entire collapse and officials saw no way of averting the disaster. The government was constantly issuing new notes which further depreciated those outstanding, and German leaders were saying that Allied and American credits furnished the only hope of the country.

CHINA DEFAULTS ON DEBTS. Default by the Chinese Government on the principal and interest of loans obtained in the United States has caused Secretary Hughes to send a note to Peking calling attention to the gravity of the situation. China's financial position probably will form one of the most important Pacific and Far Eastern topics at the Washington Conference, since the international consortium plan for providing new loans still is pending.

INDIA TO CONTINUE "CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE." The all-India Congress Committee, consisting of 200 delegates, which met at Dehli, has voted to continue the policy of "civil disobedience," including non-payment of taxes and complete non-co-operation as advocated by Mahatma K. Gandhi, which already has caused much embarrassment to the British regime.

Can There Be Health Without Internal Bathing?

A PROFESSOR in a medical college was delivering a lecture to his class. Beside him stood a large anatomical chart of the human body. Pointing to the colon (the large intestine) the professor said, "That, gentlemen, is the cause directly or indirectly of 95 per cent of human illness."

What did the professor mean? He really meant that it was the waste matter and excretions that accumulate in the colon that do the harm. This waste is bound to accumulate, because we of today neither eat the kind of food nor take the amount of exercise which nature demands in order that she may thoroughly eliminate the waste unaided.

This waste matter is extremely poisonous. And the blood passing through the colon absorbs the poisons of the waste and carries them throughout the entire system.

What's the result? You are "Auto-intoxicated" or self-poisoned. You may not know so, but you feel the effects. Your liver is sluggish. Your appetite is poor. You feel dull and heavy. You have slight or severe headaches. Your sleep does not rest or refresh you. In a word, you are only about 50 per cent efficient. And if this condition progresses to where real illness develops, it is impossible to tell what form the illness will take.

Under the conditions of modern life, nature needs a physiologically correct aid in eliminating the waste from the colon. The ideal means, as science has found, is in the use of the Internal Bath. By a certain, distinctive system, warm water is introduced so that the colon is perfectly cleansed and kept pure and sweet. Internal Bathing as recommended by Dr. Chas. A. Tyrrell, the eminent authority, makes all the difference in the world in the health of man and woman. Every person who would keep blood pure, heart and blood pressure normal, nerves relieved and mind keen, should take up Dr. Tyrrell's method of Internal Bathing.

In his booklet called "The What, The Why and The Way of Internal Bathing," Dr. Tyrrell gives some interesting and valuable information on the subject. The booklet may be had free of charge and obligation by addressing Tyrrell's Hygienic Institute, No. 134 West 65th Street, New York City, and mentioning Christian Herald. A post-card will do.—Adv.

Head off that Croup with Musterole

Keep the little white jar of Musterole handy on your bathroom shelf and you can easily head off croupy colds before they get beyond control.

The moment you hear that warning cough, get out the good old Musterole and rub this soothing ointment gently on the chest and throat.

Made from pure oil of mustard and other simple ingredients, Musterole penetrates right through the skin and breaks up the cold by relieving the congestion.

Musterole does its good work without blistering the skin like the old-fashioned mustard plaster.

Use it for treating tonsillitis, rheumatism, neuralgia, chilblains, colds and croup.

Sold by all druggists, in tubes and jars, 35c and 65c; hospital size, $3.

Life Sketches of Great Adventurers

B. Y. P. U. Matt. 7: 15-21

FOR the spirit of adventure portrayed in a lucid way and for a thrill in reading, get C. K. Harrington's book, "Captain Bickle of the Inland Sea." Captain Bickle was the master of the famous ship, the Fukuin Maru, in Japanese waters. Fukuin Maru means "Gospel Ship," and a gospel ship it was in every way, and Captain Bickle was the missionary. The inhabitants on the shores of the Inland Sea were Buddhists and very naturally opposed to the religion of Jesus Christ. Captain Bickle approached his work, not with a rosy anticipation of immediate success, but resting on the promise—"Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel, and lo, I am with you always."

Christ in the Holy Spirit was with the Captain of the Fukuin Maru, and soon a little church was established. "I will work day and night, as God may give me strength, for ten years without looking for visible results" was his determination. This determination won. Captain Bickle established numerous Sunday schools and gained church-members in sixty-five towns, and Christianity was established in more than four hundred settlements. Three years ago the Captain went to his reward. He being dead, yet speaks in the lives of those to whom he brought the light and the new environment he created.

Christian Progress Among the Immigrants

C. E. Isa. 43: 1-7

"CHRISTIAN AMERICANIZATION" is a vital topic of our day. The world is coming to our shores and with it comes not only the worst but the best from all lands. Our task is the same as that of the missionaries in the foreign field—to eliminate the bad and build up the good. We may not be able, all of us, to take an active part in the teaching and training of our new neighbors, in so far as institutional work and civic classes are concerned, but we can help in this task by the promotion of home mission study, the raising of funds and the betterment of our own lives and communities in order to make them more Christian and more in harmony with American ideals.

The Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also any one is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

AN EVANGELIST and his wife from Illinois request prayer that God will open the way so they may have six weeks of study in some Bible School in order to be better prepared for service.

P. E. W., of Tennessee, asks for the prayers of the entire Christian body to help him overcome the unfortunate habit of drink. He says: "I am now out of a position and out of funds on account of drink, but I am praying day and night to be rid of the curse and I ask you all to help me."

R. S., Philadelphia, Pa., asks that a cripple who has no hope of getting better and who has written a book may be successful in getting it published so as to help him make a living.

Mrs. E. L., of Illinois, writes: "Pray that my son who has been a persistent cigarette smoker and who has decided to give it up may be given the strength to overcome this evil."

Mrs. A. W., of South Carolina, asks that her husband, who had given up alcohol for one year and who has now returned to his old habits, may be reconsecrated to his Lord and Master.

can ideals. The foreigner is imitative. What he sees in this, his adopted land, he thinks must be right. Let us make right the things he sees.

Strangers in a strange land, here for better advantages, they may be our problem and sometimes our despair, nevertheless it is incumbent upon us all to make them intelligent and comprehensive of our modes of living and manner of thinking, so long as we live and think like Christian men and women. "All we are brethren" and the wise are to help the not so wise and the strong are to help the weak. This is the Christian ideal and an ideal we can happily say the Church has adopted for promotion. Much has already been done for the foreign born in the congested centers, and the night school, social center, Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. and wide-awake churches, are doing real and efficient work under the slogan "Americans All." Read the inspiring and romantic stories in "Old Trails and New" by Coe Hayne. It is a tale of friendliness and helpfulness and brotherliness that convinces one that the Gospel is still the message for this age not only for the remaking of an individual but for the rebuilding of a nation on nobler lines. As Professor Cummings said, "The true foundation of democracy is in the character of the people."

The Goodness of God

E. L. Thanksgiving Meeting

SEE topics for November 20 under B. Y. P. U. and C. E. By way of addenda to the exposition treated under above date or B. Y. P. U. and C. E. we offer the following: Read the One Hundred and Third Psalm.

The Psalmist counts over some of the blessings for which our soul should bless the Lord. Are we thankful for "all His benefits"? The word means "acts," "works," "dealings," and therefore we are not to forget God's dealings with us. "Surely he hath not dealt with us according to our sins." God gives and forgives.

If we are thankful to God, we will show it in our lives. Thanksgiving calls for thanksgiving.

"Thanks be to God to whom earth owes Sunshine and breeze,
The heath-clad hill, the vale's repose,
Streamlet and seas,
The snowdrop and the summer rose,
The many voiced trees."

Miss E. M. G. and mother, of Connecticut, are praying earnestly for their brother and son, who has an uncontrollable temper and is most profane and abusive with his tongue. This has caused great unhappiness in the home. Pray that he may overcome these bad habits and that happiness may be restored to the home.

Mrs. E., of Wisconsin, asks for the return of her niece who has gone astray and her parents know nothing of her location. Please pray that the clouds of darkness may be removed.

Mrs. L. R. J., of Virginia, asks prayers for a mother of six children who, it is feared, will lose her mind because of trouble. If she does not get better the children will have to go to an orphanage. Please pray that this may be averted.

Mrs. S. F. Y., of Illinois, wishes to return thanks for what God has done on behalf of a member of her family. She is still waiting upon the Lord for the answer to another prayer.

Mrs. A. R., of Hamilton, N. Y., prays for a revival and that the right man may be sent them for a pastor. There have been sixteen other requests for revivals throughout the country.

Among general requests are the following: for health, 144; financial aid, 19; for the Holy Spirit, 25; for guidance, 27; for conversion, 98; for peace of mind, 12; for employment, 10; for consecration, 16. There are also 56 acknowledgments to prayer.

Aunt Belle's Comfort Letters

Thousands of Mothers have thanked me

My Baby Book has really met with a perfectly wonderful reception. It seems as though most of my time for weeks has been spent in reading and answering thousands of delightful letters from mothers thanking me for the help which the Book has been to them.

And most of these letters make special mention of Kora-Konia which my Baby Book advises for all kinds of skin irritation such as prickly heat, diaper rash and teething rash.

Kora-Konia is one of the more recent products of the Mennen laboratories, but personally I think it's the finest thing they make. I am using it constantly in my clinical work and it just makes my heart glow the almost miraculous way it relieves the little tots, restoring inflamed creases of chubby flesh to a healthy pink, and driving away the angry rashes which must torture a baby so.

Kora-Konia is a wonderful healing powder having the peculiar virtue of clinging to the skin for hours, forming a velvety film which protects the skin while it heals it. It is antiseptic and should be used on little cuts and bruises.

Of course, Kora-Konia doesn't take the place of Mennen's Borated Talcum which is as necessary as safety pins, but I do wish that every mother in this country would get a box of Kora-Konia at once and learn what a beneficent preparation it is. Druggists sell Kora-Konia for 35c. and 50c.

Lovingly,
BELLE.

A Complete Text Book on Baby Culture

Written from a mother's viewpoint by a woman with years of experience in bringing up babies, Aunt Belle's Baby Book covers everything from preparation for motherhood through those critical first months to the child's second year.

Beautifully printed and bound and fully indexed, it is the kind of book that would ordinarily sell for at least a dollar. We are mailing it to mothers for 25 cents. Mailed in a plain wrapper. A de Luxe binding in box for Christmas gift costs $1.50.
